ance and manners strongly prepossessed them in his favour. Prepossess is more frequently used in a good sense than prejudice, and the participial adjective prepossessing has always a good sense.

It is manifest that such a doctrine was irreconcilable with the interests of any party out of power, whose best hope to regain it is commonly by prepossessing the nation with a bad opinion of their adversaries.

Hamlet.

Prepossessing (pré-poz-zes'ing), a. Tending to invite favour before there is any rational ground for it; having the power of creating an impression favourable to the owner; engaging; said especially of the external characteristics of a person; as, a prepossessing face or manner.

Prepossession (pré-poz-zesh'on), n. 1. Pre-occupation; prior possession. Hammond. 2. Preconceived opinion; the effect of previous impressions on the mind or heart, in favour or against any person or thing. It is often used in a good sense; sometimes it is equivalent to prejudice, and sometimes a softer name for it. In general, it conveys an idea less odious than prejudice. 'Captivated to these deceiving prepossessions.' Glanville. 'The prepossessions of childhood and youth.' D. Stewart.

I am delighted to think, Walter, that you seem entirely to have overcome the unfavourable prepossession which at first you testified towards our excellent neighbour.

Lord Lytton.

SYN. Preoccupancy, preoccupation, prejudgment, bias, bent.

Prepossessor (pré-poz-zes'ér), n. One that prepossesses; one that possesses before another.

Prepunctuality (pré-punk'tô-âl'i-ti), n. More than punctuality, as the habit of keeping an appointment or other engagement somewhat before the time; excessive punctuality.

In Mr. Arthur Helps' 'In Memoriam' in this month's Macmillan, speaking of Charles Dickens's more than punctuality, he has happily described the quality by so characteristic a term 'prepunctuality,' that the word must henceforth assume a recognized place in our language.

Notes and Queries.

Preputial (pré-pû'sh'al), a. Pertaining to the prepuce or foreskin. Bp. Corbet.

Pre-Raphaelism (pré-ra'fa-el-izm), n. Same as Pre-Raphaelitism.

Pre-Raphaelite (pré-ra'fa-el-it), a. Pertaining to or characteristic of pre-Raphaelitism (which see); as, pre-Raphaelite theories; the pre-Raphaelite school.

Pre-Raphaelite (pré-ra'fa-el-it), n. One who practises or favours the style of art before the time of Raphael; one who adopts pre-Raphaelitism (which see).

Pre-Raphaelitism (pré-ra'fa-el-it-izm), n. The system or style of painting practised by the early painters before the time of Raphael; the modern revival of their style or system. The essential characteristic of the style is a rigid adherence to natural form and effect, and the consequent rejection of all efforts to elevate, beautify, or heighten the effect in any way by ideal modifications either in drawing, arrangement, or colouring, based on conventional rules derived from the works of the great masters of the several schools. See extract.

Pre-Raphaelitism has but one principle, that of uncompromising truth in all that it does, obtained by working everything, down to the most minute detail, from nature and from nature only. Or, where imagination is necessarily trusted to, by always endeavouring to conceive a fact as it really was likely to have happened, rather than as it most prettily might have happened. Every pre-Raphaelite landscape background is painted to the last touch, in the open air, from the thing itself. Every pre-Raphaelite figure, however studied in expression, is a true portrait of some living person. Every minute accessory is painted in the same manner. . . . This is the main pre-Raphaelite principle.

Ruskin.

Preremote (pré-rê-mô't), a. More remote in previous time or prior order. Dr. E. Darwin.

Prerequisite (pré-ek'wî-zit), a. Previously required; necessary to something subsequent. Sir T. Browne.

Prerequisite (pré-ek'wî-zit), n. Something that is previously required or necessary to an end proposed.

Class is a notion, itself the result of an induction, it cannot therefore be postulated as a prerequisite or element of that process itself.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Preresolve (pré-rê-zôlv'), v.t. pret. & pp. preresolved; ppr. preresolving. To resolve previously. Sir E. Dering.

Prerogative (pré-ro-g'a-tiv), n. [L. prærogativa, called upon to vote first, having the first vote, precedence in voting, privilege, prerogative, from prærogo, to ask before—præ, before, and rogo, to ask.] 1. An exclusive or peculiar privilege; a privilege belonging to one in virtue of his character or position; an indefeasible right; in a narrower sense, an official and hereditary right which may be asserted without question, and for the exercise of which there is no responsibility or accountability as to the fact and manner of its exercise; as, the prerogative of a father to exact obedience from his children; it is the prerogative of the House of Commons to determine on the validity of the election of its own members.

The prerogative which God gave unto Peter . . . help the bishop of Rome's cause nothing at all.

Bp. Gardner.

My fortunes having cast me on your niece, give me this prerogative of speech.

Shak.

2. Pre-eminence; precedence. 'Then give me leave to have prerogative.' Shak.—The royal prerogative is that special pre-eminence which a sovereign has over all other persons, and out of the course of the common law, in right of the regal dignity. In Britain the royal prerogative includes the right of making war and concluding peace, of sending and receiving ambassadors, of making treaties, &c.—Prerogative court, in Great Britain, an ecclesiastical court formerly existing for the trial of testamentary causes, where the deceased had left effects in two different dioceses. This jurisdiction was taken away from the ecclesiastics and transferred to a new court, called the probate court, by 20 and 21 Vict. lxxvii.—Prerogative writ, in law, a process issued upon extraordinary occasions on proper cause shown. Prescribe (prez-skrib), v.t. pret. & pp. prescribed; ppr. prescribing. [L. prescribere — pro, before, and scribere, to write. See SCRIBE.] 1. To lay down authoritatively for direction; to give as a rule of conduct; as, to prescribe laws or rules.

Prescribe not as our duties. Shak.

There's joy, when to wild will you laws prescribe. Dryden.

2. In med. to direct to be used as a remedy.

The end of satire is the amendment of vices by correction; and he who writes honestly is no more an enemy to the offender than the physician to the patient, when he prescribes harsh remedies. Dryden.

3. To direct. 'Let streams prescribe their fountains where to run.' Dryden. — SYN. To appoint, order, command, dictate, ordain, institute, establish.

Prescribe (prez-skrib), v.t. pret. & pp. prescribed; ppr. prescribing. 1. To give law; to lay down rules or directions; to dictate.

The assuming an authority of dictating to others, and a forwardness to prescribe to their opinions, is a constant concomitant of this bias of our judgments. Locke.

2. To write or give medical directions; to direct what remedies are to be used; as, to prescribe for a patient in a fever. — 3. In law, (a) to claim by prescription; to claim a title to a thing by immemorial use and enjoyment: with for; as, to prescribe for a right of way, of common, or the like. (b) To become extinguished or of no validity through lapse of time, as a right, debt, obligation, and the like.

That obligation upon the lands did not prescribe or come into disuse, but by fifty consecutive years of exemption. Arbutnot.

The negative prescription of obligations by the lapse of forty years, was first introduced by the statute 1450, c. 20, which declares that the person having interest in an obligation shall follow the same within the space of forty years, and take document thereupon; and if he does not, that it shall prescribe and be of no avail. Bell.

Prescription (prez-skrip-shon), n. [L. prescriptio.] See PRESCRIBE. 1. The act of prescribing or directing by rules; that which is prescribed; direction; prescript.

Who vainly brake the covenant of their God, Nor in the ways of his prescription trod. Sandys.

2. In med. a direction of remedies for a disease, and the manner of using them; a written statement of the medicines or remedies to be used by a patient.

My reason, the physician to my love, Angry that his prescriptions are not kept, Hath left me. Shak.

3. A claim or title based on long use or custom; specifically, in law, the claim of title to a thing by virtue of immemorial or long use and enjoyment; or the right to a thing derived from such use, such as a right of way, or of common, or the like; as, to acquire possession of a thing by prescription. After uninterrupted enjoyment for thirty, and in many cases for twenty years, a prima facie title arises by prescription to the thing enjoyed, and unless such enjoyment have continued under some consent or agreement, the title becomes in sixty years absolute and indefeasible. Prescription differs from custom, which is a local usage, and not annexed to any person, whereas prescription is a personal usage. In Scots law, the claim to lands acquired by uninterrupted possession upon some written title for a period now fixed at twenty years. This is positive prescription. Negative prescription is the loss or omission of a right by neglecting to use it during the time limited by law. This term is also used for limitation, in the recovery of money due by bond, &c.

It will be found a work of no small difficulty to dispossess a vice from the heart where long possession begins to plead prescription. South.

Democracy does not require the support of prescription. Monarchy has often stood without that support, but a patrician order is the work of time. Macaulay.

Prescriptive (prez-skript-iv), a. 1. Consisting in or acquired by prescription; as, a prescriptive right or title. — 2. Pleading the continuance and authority of custom.

The right to be drowsy in protracted toil has become prescriptive. J. M. Mason.

Presellect (prez-sel-ekt), v.t. To select beforehand.

Presence (prez-ens), n. [Fr., from L. presentia — pro, before, and esse, to be.] 1. The state of being present; the existence of a person or thing in a certain place: opposed to absence; as, this event happened during the king's presence at the theatre; to detect the presence of noxious effluvia. — 2. The being in company with, especially with a common object; company; society.

To-night we hold a solemn supper, And I'll request your presence. Shak.

3. The state of being within sight or call; neighbourhood or vicinity without the intervention of anything that prevents intercourse.

Full many a noble war-song had he sung, Even in the presence of an enemy's fleet. Tennyson.

4. Persons assembled in a place, especially persons of rank; noble company.

I know not by what power I am made bold, In such a presence here to plead my thoughts. Shak.

Odmar, of all this presence does contain, Give her your wrath whom you esteem most fair. Dryden.

5. Approach face to face or nearness of a great personage; the state of being in view of a superior.

Men that very presence fear, Which once they knew authority did bear. Daniel.

6. Personality; the person of a superior, as a sovereign. 'Your royal presences be ruled by me.' Shak.

The Sovran Presence thus replied: Was she thy God, that her thou didst obey? Milton.

7. Mien; air; personal appearance; demeanour. 'Be, as thy presences is, gracious and kind.' Shak.

Virtue is best in a body that is comely, and that has rather dignity of presence, than beauty of aspect. Bacon.

8. The apartment in which an assembly is held before a prince or other great personage; a presence-chamber; a state-room.

Here lies Juliet, and her beauty makes This vault a feasting presence full of light. Shak. An't please your grace, the two great cardinals Wait in the presence. Shak.

— Presence of mind, readiness of invention; quickness in devising expedients on pressing occasions; a calm, collected state of the mind, with its faculties ready at command, which enables a person to speak or act without disorder or embarrassment in unexpected difficulties.

Errors, not to be recalled, do find Their best redress from presence of the mind. Walter.

—Primary rocks, in geol. rocks of a crystalline structure supposed to owe their present state to igneous agency. They were held to be older than the most ancient European group (graywacke), and no distinct fossils have as yet been discovered in them. Primary rocks were divided into two groups, the stratified and unstratified. The stratified group consisted of the rocks called gneiss, mica schist, argillaceous schist, hornblende schist, and all slaty and crystalline strata generally. The unstratified group was composed in a great measure of granite, and rocks closely allied to granite. The term primary was applied to those rocks, because it was supposed, from the absence of fossil remains, that they were formed before animals and vegetables, as well as that they were the first rocks formed, but it has been discovered that some primary formations are newer than many secondary groups. They were originally termed primitive rocks, but both appellations are now generally abandoned by modern geologists.

Primary (pri-mā'ri), n. 1. That which stands highest in rank or importance, as opposed to secondary.—2. A name given to one of the large feathers on the outermost joint of a bird's wing, and inserted upon that part which represents the hand of man.

Prince (prín), n. [Fr., from L. princeps, princeps, a prince—prímus, first, and capio, to take.] 1. One holding the first or highest rank; a sovereign; the chief and independent ruler of a nation or state. Originally the word was applied to a ruler of either sex.

Then we cried, 'God save your Majesty! God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen turned and said, 'God bless you all, my good people.' Then we cried again, 'God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen said again to us, 'You may well have a greater, but you shall never have a more loving Prince.' Bp. Goodman.

2. A sovereign who has the government of a particular state or territory, but holds of a superior to whom he owes certain services.

3. The son of a sovereign, or the issue of a royal family; as, princes of the blood. On the Continent the title prince is borne by some families of eminent rank not immediately connected with any reigning house. In Britain, dukes, marquesses, and earls are entitled, in strict heraldic language, to the title of prince; but in practice the title is restricted to members of the royal family. The only case in which the title is a territorial one is that of the Prince of Wales.—4. The chief of any body of men; one who is at the head of any class, profession, &c.; one who is pre-eminent in anything; as, a merchant prince.

To use the words of the prince of learning hereupon, only in shallow and small boats they glide over the face of the Virginian sea. Tracham.

—Prince of the senate, in anc. Rome, was the person first called in the roll of senators. He was always of consular and censorial dignity.

Prince (prín), v. t. pret. prínced; ppr. príncing. To play the prince; to take state; with a complementary it.

Nature prompts them
In simple and low things to prínce it much
Beyond the trick of others. Shak.

Príncege (prín'sá), n. The body of princeps. Month. Rev. [Rare.]

Príncedom (prín's'dum), n. The jurisdiction, rank, or estate of a prince.

Under thee, as head supreme,
Thrones, príncedoms, powers, dominions, I reduce. Milton.

Prínceite (prín'sít), n. A follower of Henry James Prínce, formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, who founded a conventual establishment of a singular kind, called 'Agapemone,' or the abode of love. The inmates consist of persons of both sexes, and profess to submit themselves only to the law of love.

Prínce-like (prín'slík), a. Becoming a prince; like a prince. Shak.

Prínce-wood (prín's-wúd), n. A light-veined brown West Indian wood, the produce of Cordia gerascanthoides and Hamelia ventricosa. Treas. of Bot.

Prínce-ified (prín'sí-fid), a. Imitating a prince; suggestive of an exalted personage; fantastically dignified.

The English girls... laughed at the prínce-ified airs which she gave herself from a very early age. Thackeray.

Prínce-pal (prín'sí-pal), a. [Fr.; L. príncipalis, from prínceps, first in time or order, the first. See PRINCE.] 1. Chief; highest in rank, character, authority, or importance; first; main; essential; most considerable; as, the prínce-pal officers of a government; the prínce-pal men of a city, town, or state; the prínce-pal arguments in a case; the prínce-pal beams of a building; the prínce-pal productions of a country. 'Wisdom is the prínce-pal thing.' Prov. iv. 7. 'The prínce-pal men of the army.' Shak.—2. Of or pertaining to a prince; princely. Spenser.—Prínce-pal axis, in conic sections, the axis which passes through the two foci; in the parabola, the diameter passing through the focus.—Prínce-pal brace, in carp. one immediately under the principal rafters, or parallel to them, assisting with the principals to support the roof timbers.—Prínce-pal challenge, in law, is where the cause assigned carries with it prima facie evidence of partiality, favour, or malice.—Prínce-pal post, the corner-post of a timber-framed house.—Prínce-pal ray, that which passes perpendicularly from the spectator's eye to the perspective plane or picture.—Prínce-pal rafters, the strong rafters used for trussing the beams in a roof. See under the noun PRINCIPAL, 6.—Prínce-pal section, in crystal, a plane passing through the optical axis of a crystal.—Prínce-pal subject or theme, in music, one of the chief subjects of a movement in sonata form, as opposed to a subordinate theme.—PRIN, Chief, leading, main, great, capital, cardinal, essential.

Prínce-pal (prín'sí-pal), n. 1. A chief or head; one who takes a leading part; one primarily engaged; a chief party.

Seconds in factions do many times, when the faction subdivideth, prove prínce-pals. Bacon.

We are not prínce-pals but auxiliaries in the war. Swift.

2. A president or governor; one chief in authority; the head of a college or university in Scotland, and of several colleges in English universities, or other institutions.—3. In law, (a) the actor or absolute perpetrator of a crime, or an abettor. A principal in the first degree is the absolute perpetrator of the crime; a principal in the second degree is one who is present, aiding and abetting the fact to be done; distinguished from an accessory. In treason all persons concerned are principals. (b) A person who employs another to act under him or for him, the person so employed being termed agent. (c) A person for whom another becomes surety; one who is liable for a debt in the first instance.—4. In com. a capital sum lent on interest, due as a debt or used as a fund; so called in distinction to interest or profits.—5. In music, the name of a stop or row of metal pipes in an organ tuned an octave higher than the diapason, an octave lower than the fifteenth, and serving to blend the two as well as to augment the volume of sound. All the other stops are tuned from the prínce-pal.—6. A main timber in an assemblage of carpentry; especially one of those rafters which are larger than the common rafters, and which are framed at their lower ends into the tiebeam, and at their upper ends are either united at the king-post or made to beam against the ends of the straining-beams when queen-posts are used. The principals support the purlins, which again carry the common rafters, and thus the whole weight of the roof is sustained by the principals.

The very principals did seem to read,
And all to topple. Shak.

7. In the fine arts, the chief circumstance in a work of art to which the rest are to be subordinate.—8. One of the turrets or pinnacles of waxwork and tapers with which the posts and centre of a bazaar were formerly crowned. Oxford Glossary.—9. A heirloom. Cowell.

Prínce-pality (prín'sí-pal'i-tí), n. [Fr. prínce-palité.] 1. Sovereignty; supreme power.

Nothing was given to Henry but the name of king; all other absolute power of prínce-pality he had. Steuart.

2. A prince; one invested with sovereignty. 'Niaroch of prínce-palties the prime.' Wilton.

Let her be a prínce-pality
Sovereign to all the creatures on the earth. Shak.

3. The territory of a prince, or the country which gives title to a prince; as, the prínce-pality of Wales.—4. Superiority; predominance.

If any mystery be effective of spiritual blessings, then this is much more, as having the prerogative and prínce-pality above everything else. Jer. Taylor.

5. Royal state or condition. Jer. xiii. 18.

Prínce-pally (prín'sí-pal'i), adv. In the principal or chief place; chiefly; above all; as, he was anxious about many things, but prínce-pally about this.

They wholly mistake the nature of criticism who think its business is prínce-pally to find fault. Dryden.

Prínce-palness (prín'sí-pal-ne), n. The state of being principal or chief.

Prínce-pate (prín'sí-pát), n. [L. prínce-patus, from prínceps, a prince.] Princeliness; supreme rule. 'The prínce-pate of the whole church.' Barrow.

Prínce-pia (prín'sí-pí-a), n. pl. [L. prínce-pium.] First principles; elements; the contracted title of the Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica of Newton.

Prínce-pial (prín'sí-pí'al), a. Elementary; initial. Bacon.

Prínce-pial-ant (prín'sí-pí-ant), a. Relating to principles or beginnings. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Prínce-piate (prín'sí-pí-át), v. t. [From L. prínce-pium, a beginning.] To initiate.

It imports the things or effects prínce-piated or effected by the intelligent active principle. Sir M. Hale.

Prínce-piation (prín'sí-pí-á'shon), n. [From L. prínce-pium, a principle or element.] Analysis into constituent or elemental parts. Bacon. 'A faultless prínce-piation of language.' Melville Bell.

Prínce-pial (prín'sí-pí), n. [Fr. prínceps, from L. prínce-pium, a beginning, origin, principle, element, from prínceps, prínceps. See PRINCE. As to the insertion of the comp. participle, syllable.] 1. Beginning; commencement. 'Doubting, sad end of prínce-pal unsound.' Spenser. Hence—2. A source or origin; that from which a thing proceeds; the primary source from which anything is, becomes, or is known; element; primordial substance. 'Found that one first prínce-pial must be.' Dryden.

Modern philosophers suppose matter to be one simple prínce-pial, or solid extension diversified by its various shapes. Watts.

3. An original faculty or endowment of the mind.

Under this title are comprehended all those active prínce-pals whose direct and ultimate object is the communication either of enjoyment or suffering to any of our fellow-creatures. D. Stewart.

4. A general truth; a law comprehending many subordinate truths; a law on which others are founded or from which others are derived; an axiom; a maxim; as, the prínce-pals of morality, of law, of government, &c.

He lays down these fundamental prínce-pals as those of three kinds into which he divides all governments. Brougham.

Our conclusion, then, respecting the whole question of first prínce-pals, speculative and practical, is this, that although in their abstract form they are not innate, yet that there are innate faculties, laws of thought which, when put into action by experience, necessarily give rise to them as primitive judgments; and that these judgments, at first applied in the concrete, at length by a process of abstraction, assume a perfect axiomatic form. Experience, accordingly, is the occasion of their production, but their real cause or origin is to be found in the native energy of the human mind. J. D. Morell.

6. A tenet; that which is believed, whether truth or not, but which serves as a rule of action or the basis of a system; a governing law of conduct; a settled rule of action; a doctrine; as, the principles of the Stoics or of the Epicureans; hence, a right rule of conduct, uprightness; as, a man of principles.

Try
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith, of honour.

9. Ground of conduct; a motive.

There would be but small improvements in the world were there not some common principle of action working equally with all men.

7. In chem. (a) a component part; an element; as, the constituent principles of bodies. (b) A substance, on the presence of which certain qualities, common to a number of bodies, depend. See Proximate Principles under PROXIMATE. — A principle of human nature is a law of action in human beings; a constitutional propensity common to the human species.

There are no two words in the English language used so confusedly one for the other as the words rule and principle. . . You can make a rule; you cannot make a principle; you can lay down a rule, you cannot, properly speaking, lay down a principle. It is laid down for you. You can establish a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, establish a principle. You can only declare it. Rules are within your power, principles are not. Yet the mass of mankind use the words as if they had exactly similar meanings, and choose one or the other as may best suit the rhythm of the sentence.

Principle (prin'si-pl), v. t. prink & pp. principled; ppr. principling. 1. To establish or fix in certain principles; to impress with any tenet, good or ill; used in past participle. 'With goodness principled.' Milton. 2. To establish firmly in the mind of.

Let an enthusiast be principled that he or his teacher is inspired, and you in vain bring the evidence of clear reasons against his doctrine. Locke.

Princock, Princock (prin'kok, prin'koks), n. [Prin and cock.] A cockcomb; a conceited person; a pert young rogue. Shack.

Pringle (prin'le-a), n. [From Sir John Pringle, the physician and natural philosopher.] A genus of Cruciferae, the sole representative of which is P. antiscorbuticus, a remarkable cabbage-like plant confined to Kerguelen's Island, and hence often called Kerguelen's Island cabbage. It is a powerful antiscorbutic, and is invaluable to the crews of ships touching at Kerguelen's Island.

Prink (prink), v. t. [A slightly modified form of prank.] 1. To prank; to dress for show.

Hold a good wager she was every day longer prinking in the glass than you was. Jane Collier.

2. To strut; to put on stately airs.

Prink (prink), v. t. To deck; to adorn fantastically; to dress or adjust to ostentation; as, to prink the hair. Cooper.

It is a most pernicious education for a poet like Burns to prink the unadorned simplicity of his ploughman's Nae with the glittering shagwags and curious lace-work of a highly polished literary style.

Prinker (prink'er), n. One who prinks, one who dresses with much care.

Prinos (pri'nos), n. [Gr. prinos, the holly, which this genus much resembles.] A genus of shrubs belonging to the nat. order Aquifoliaceae. The species are natives of North America, the West Indies, and the warmer parts of Asia. Some of them are evergreen, while others are deciduous, and some have bright red holly-like berries, while in others they are purple or black. The bark and berries of P. verticillatus possess, in an eminent degree, the properties of astringent and tonic medicines, along with antiseptic powers. P. glaber is used as a substitute for tea. Called also Winter-berry.

Print (print), v. t. [Shortened from emprint, imprint; Fr. empreinte, impression, stamp, a participial form from empreindre, to print, imprint, from L. imprimere, impressum, to press (which see).] 1. To impress; to imprint. 'Printing their boots on the earth.' Shak. 'And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss.' Byron. — 2. To mark by pressing one thing on another.

On his bery steez betwix he rode,
That scarcely prints the turf on which he trod.

3. To take an impression of, to form by impression, to stamp. 'Perhaps some foot-steps printed in the clay.' Rowson.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh, . . . nor print any marks upon you. Lev. xii. 30.

4. To fix deeply, as in the mind or memory. And hill and wood and field did print
The same sweet forms in either mind. Tennyson.

5. In specific or technical senses: (a) to form or copy by pressure, as from a stereotype plate, a form of movable types, engraved copper or steel plates, stone, &c.; as, to print books, engravings, lithographs, &c. (b) To stamp or impress with coloured figures, as cotton cloth. See Calico-printing. (c) In photog. to take a positive picture of, as from a negative, on suitably prepared paper.

Print (print), v. t. 1. To use or practice the art of typography, or of taking impressions of letters, figures, and the like. — 2. To make books by means of the press; to publish a book.

From the moment he prints, he must expect to hear no more of truth.

Print (print), n. 1. A mark made by impression; any line, character, figure, or indentation, made by the pressure of one body or thing on another; hence, fig. a mark, vestige, or impression of any kind, a stamp.

Sheldon was esteemed a learned man before the wars, but he was now engaged so deep in politics that scarce any prints of what he had been remained.

2. Printed letters, the impressions of types in general, considered in regard to form, size, &c., as, a small print; a large print.

The small Geneva print referred to, we apprehend, was the type used in the common copies of the Geneva translation of the Bible.

3. That which impresses its form on anything, as, a butter-print. In iron-working, a swage; a mould sunk in metal from which an impression is taken. — 4. That which is produced by printing. (a) the representation or figure of anything made by impression; specifically, an engraving. 'A collection of prints of eminent persons.' I. D'Iraeth. (b) A printed publication, more especially a newspaper or other periodical.

The prints, about three days after, were filled with the same terms.

(c) A printed cloth. (d) A plaster cast of a hat ornament, or a plaster ornament formed from a mould. Oxford Glossary. (e) In photog. a positive picture. — In print, (a) in a printed form; issued from the press; published. 'I love a ballad in print.' Shak. (b) In a formal method; with exactness; in a precise and perfect manner.

He must speak in print, walk in print, eat and drink in print.

— Out of print, a phrase which signifies that, of a printed and published work, there are no copies for sale, or none for sale by the publisher.

Printed-goods (print'ed-gudz), n. pl. Printed or figured calicoes.

Printer (print'er), n. One who prints books, pamphlets, newspapers, and such like; also, one who prints cloth, or one who takes im-

on paper, cloth, or other material; the business of a printer; typography. There are several distinct branches of the art, as the printing of books, &c., with movable types, typography, the printing of engraved copper or steel plates (see ENGRAVING), the taking of impressions from stone (see LITHOGRAPHY), and the impressing of a fabric with coloured designs (see CALICO-PRINTING). The most important branch of printing is what is called letterpress printing, or the method of taking impressions from letters and other characters cast or cut in relief upon separate pieces of metal, and therefore capable of indefinite combination. The impressions are taken either directly from the type surface or from stereotype plates (see STEREOTYPE), and are effected either by superficial or surface pressure, as in the hand printing-press, or by lineal or cylindrical pressure, as in the printing-machine, or by the action of a roller, as in the copperplate-press or roller-press. The pigments or inks, of whatever colour, are always laid upon the surface of the types or stereotype plate. Wood-cuts and other engravings in relief are also printed in this manner. In copper and steel plate printing the characters are engraved in intaglio, and the inks contained within the lines of the engravings, and not upon the surface of the plate. Cotton or calico printing is from surfaces engraved either in relief or in intaglio. The art of letterpress printing, which was invented by Gutenberg at Mainz, about the year 1450, is divided into two departments — composition, or the arrangement of the types, and press-work, or the taking of impressions from the types so arranged; the workmen employed are therefore distinguished into two classes — compositors and pressmen. Printing was first introduced into England by William Caxton about 1474. 2. In photog. the act or art of obtaining a positive photographic picture from a negative, or a picture in which the lights and shades are true to nature from one in which they are reversed.

Printing-frame (print'ing-frām), n. 1. In letterpress printing, a stand to support the cases containing types at which a compositor works. — 2. In photog. a quadrangular shallow box in which sensitized paper is placed beneath a negative and exposed to the direct rays of light.

Printing-ink (print'ing-ingk), n. Ink used by printers of books. Its composition, generally speaking, is linseed-oil boiled to a varnish, with colouring matter added to it.

Printing-machine (print'ing-ma-shēn), n. A machine for taking impressions from type, electrotype, or stereotype forms, steel or copper plates, lithographic stones, &c. Printing-machines include a self-inking apparatus; and they are moved either by hand, steam, or other power. In most cases the impression taken from the 'forms' worked by them is effected by a cylinder or several cylinders, in others by a flat press, like the press platen. The first self-acting printing-machine dates from a patent of W. Nicholson in 1790; the next practical attempt was made in 1804, at the expense of the late Mr. Walter of the Times, by T. Martyn. But the first working machine was constructed ten years afterwards by two ingenious Germans, Meuser, Koenig and Bauer. On this machine the Times of Nov. 29, 1814, was printed by steam, at the rate of 1100 impressions per hour. Since then successive improvements have raised the amount on that and other

Prîe-dîm (prî-dî-e), n. [Fr., pray God.] A kneeling-desk for prayers.

Prîe (prî), n. Frod. 'To make prîe.' Spenser.

Prîer (prî-er), n. One who prîe; one who inquires narrowly; one who searches and scrutinizes. Fowler.

Priest (prîst), n. [A. Sax. preost, Contr. from L. presbyter. See PRESBYTER.] 1. A man who officiates in sacred offices, a minister of public worship; especially, a minister of sacrifice or other mediatorial offices. In primitive ages the fathers of families, princes, and kings discharged the functions of priests. The Mosiac priesthood was the inheritance of the family of Aaron, and consisted of a high-priest and of inferior priests, distributed into twenty-four classes.

See, Father, what first-fruits on earth are sprung From thy implanted grace in man: these sighs And prayers, which in this golden censor, mix'd With incense, I thy priest before thee bring. Milton.

2. A person who is set apart or consecrated to the ministry of the gospel; a man in orders or licensed to preach the gospel; a presbyter. In its most general sense, the word includes archbishops, bishops, patriarchs, and all subordinate orders of the clergy duly approved and licensed according to the forms and rules of each respective denomination of Christians. But in Great Britain, in the Episcopal Church, the word is understood to denote the subordinate order of the clergy above a deacon and below a bishop. In the Church of Scotland, and among other Protestant denominations of Great Britain, the word priest is not used.

Priest-cap (prîst'kap), n. In fort. an outwork with three salient and two entering angles.

Priestcraft (prîst'kraft), n. Priestly policy or system of management based on temporal or material interest; management of selfish and ambitious priests to gain wealth and power, or to impose on the credulity of others.

The follies of his (Henry the Fifth) youth, the selfish ambition of his manhood, the Lollards roasted at slow fires, the prisoners massacred on the field of battle, the expiring lease of priestcraft renewed for another century, the dreadful legacy of a causeless and hopeless war bequeathed to a people who had no interest in its event, everything is forgotten but the victory of Agincourt. Macaulay.

Priestcraft (prîst'kraft-î), n. Relating to or characterized by priestcraft. Worcester.

Priestery (prîst'ri), n. Priests collectively; the priesthood; in contempt. Milton.

Priestess (prîst'es), n. A woman who officiated in sacred rites.

She as priestess knows the rites, Wherewith the God of earth delights. Shak.

Priesthood (prîst'hôd), n. 1. The office or character of a priest.

Chaplain, away! thy priesthood saves thy life. Shak.

2. The order of men set apart for sacred

These I call original or primary qualities of bodies. Locke.

—Primary quills, in ornith. the largest feathers of the wings of a bird; primaries.—Primary rocks, in geol. rocks of a crystalline structure supposed to owe their present state to igneous agency. They were held to be older than the most ancient European group (graywacke), and no distinct fossils have as yet been discovered in them. Primary rocks were divided into two groups, the stratified and unstratified. The stratified group consisted of the rocks called gneiss, mica schist, argillaceous schist, hornblende schist, and all slaty and crystalline strata generally. The unstratified group was composed in a great measure of granite, and rocks closely allied to granite. The term primary was applied to those rocks, because it was supposed, from the absence of fossil remains, that they were formed before animals and vegetables, as well as that they were the first rocks formed, but it has been discovered that some primary formations are newer than many secondary groups. They were originally termed primitive rocks, but both appellations are now generally abandoned by modern geologists.

Primary (pri-mâr-i), n. 1. That which stands highest in rank or importance, as opposed to secondary.—2. A name given to one of the large feathers on the outermost joint of a bird's wing, and inserted upon that part which represents the hand of man.

Primum Mobile (prí'mum mob'l-ís). [L.] First cause of motion; prime mover; specifically, in the Ptolemaic system, the tenth or outermost of the revolving spheres of the universe, which was supposed to revolve from east to west in twenty-four hours, and to carry the others along with it in its motion.

Primus (prí'mus), n. [L. first.] The first in dignity among the bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church. He is chosen by the other bishops, presides at all their meetings, and has certain other privileges, but possesses no metropolitan authority.

Primwort (prím'wört), n. Any plant of the nat. order Primulaceæ. Pop. Ency.

Prímý (prím'ý), a. Blooming; early. 'In the youth of prímý nature.' Shak.

Prince (prins), n. [Fr. from L. princeps, princeps, a prince—primus, first, and capio, to take.] 1. One holding the first or highest rank; a sovereign; the chief and independent ruler of a nation or state. Originally the word was applied to a ruler of either sex.

Then we cried, 'God save your Majesty! God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen turned and said, 'God bless you all, my good people.' Then we cried again, 'God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen said again to us, 'You may well have a greater, but you shall never have a more loving Prince!' Bp. Goodman.

2. A sovereign who has the government of a particular state or territory, but holds of a superior to whom he owes certain services. 3. The son of a sovereign, or the issue of a royal family; as, princes of the blood. On the Continent the title prince is borne by some families of eminent rank not immediately connected with any reigning house. In Britain, dukes, marquesses, and earls are entitled, in strict heraldic language, to the title of prince; but in practice the title is restricted to members of the royal family. The only case in which the title is a territorial one is that of the Prince of Wales.—4. The chief of any body of men; one who is at the head of any class, profession, &c.; one who is pre-eminent in anything; as, a merchant prince.

To use the words of the prince of learning hereupon, only in shallow and small boats they glide over the face of the Virginian sea. Fracham.

—Prince of the senate, in anc. Rome, was the person first called in the roll of senators. He was always of consular and censorian dignity.

Prince (prins), v. t. pret. princéd; ppr. princing. To play the prince; to take state; with a complementary it.

Nature prompts them
In simple and low things to prince it much
Beyond the trick of others. Shak.

Princesage (prins'áj), n. The body of princes. Month. Rev. [Rare.]

Princedom (prins'dum), n. The jurisdiction, rank, or estate of a prince.

Under thee, as head supreme,
Thrones, princedoms, powers, dominions, I reduce. Milton.

Princeps (prins'it), n. A follower of Henry James Prince, formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, who founded a conventual establishment of a singular kind, called 'Agapemone,' or the abode of love. The inmates consist of persons of both sexes, and profess to submit themselves only to the law of love.

Princlike (prins'lik), a. Becoming a prince; like a prince. Shak.

Princliness (prins'li-nes), n. The quality of being princely.

Princling (prins'ling), n. A petty prince. Young.

Princlý (prins'li), a. 1. Pertaining to a prince; having the rank of a prince; royal; regal. 'His princlý name.' Shak. 'His princlý feet.' Shak.—2. Resembling a prince; having the appearance of one high born; stately; dignified; high-minded; noble. He is as full of valour as of kindness; Princlý in both. Shak.

3. Becoming a prince; royal; grand; august; magnificent; magnificent; as, princlý virtues; a princlý gift; a princlý entertainment; a princlý fortune.

Ay, beauty's princlý majesty is such,
Confound the tongue and makes the senses rough. Shak.

Princlý (prins'li), adv. In a princelike manner. Shak.

Princlý-royal (prins-roi'al), n. The eldest son of a sovereign.

Prince's-feather (prins-sez-feth'ér), n. An annual plant of the genus Amaranthus, the A. Apocynandricus. The larger prince's-feather is A. speciosus.

Prince's-metal (prins-sez-met'al), n. A mixture of copper and zinc, in which the proportion of zinc is greater than in brass: said to have been invented by Prince Rupert, and so called also Prince Rupert's Metal. Prince's-pine (prins-sez-pin), n. The false winter-green (Chimaphila umbellata), an ornamental shrub with pinkish flowers, common in North America.

Princess (prins'es), n. 1. A female sovereign; a female having the rank of a prince. 'So excellent a princess as the present queen.' Swift.—2. The daughter of a sovereign, or a female member of a royal family. 3. The consort of a prince; as, the Princess of Wales.

Princess-like (prins'es-lik), a. Like a princess; in the manner of a princess.

Princlý (prins'es-li), a. Princess-like. Byron. [Rare.]

Princlý-royal (prins-roi'al), n. The eldest daughter of a sovereign.

Princlýwood (prins'wud), n. A light-veined brown West Indian wood, the produce of Cordia geracanthoides and Hamelia ventricosa. Treas. of Bot.

Princlýd (prins'id), a. Imitating a prince; suggestive of an exalted personage; fantastically dignified.

The English girls . . . laughed at the princlýd airs which she gave herself from a very early age. Thackeray.

Princlý (prins'id-pal), a. [Fr. L. princlý, from princeps, first in time or order, the first. See PRINCE.] 1. Chief; highest in rank, character, authority, or importance; first; main; essential; most considerable; as, the princlý officers of a government; the princlý men of a city, town, or state; the princlý arguments in a case; the princlý beams of a building; the princlý productions of a country. 'Wisdom is the princlý thing.' Prov. iv. 7. 'The princlý men of the army.' Shak.—2. Of or pertaining to a prince; princely. Spenser.—Princlý axis, in conic sections, the axis which passes through the two foci; in the parabola, the diameter passing through the focus. — Princlý brace, in carp. one immediately under the principal rafters, or parallel to them, assisting with the principals to support the roof timbers. — Princlý challenge, in law, is where the cause assigned carries with it prima facie evidence of partiality, favour, or malice. — Princlý post, the corner post of a timber-framed house. — Princlý ray, that which passes perpendicularly from the spectator's eye to the perspective plane or picture. — Princlý rafters, the strong rafters used for trussing the beams in a roof. See under the noun PRINCIPAL, 6. — Princlý section, in crystal, a plane passing through the optical axis of a crystal. — Princlý subject or theme, in music, one of the chief subjects of a movement in sonata form, as opposed to a subordinate theme. — Byn. Chief, leading, main, great, capital, cardinal, essential.

Princlý (prins'id-pal), n. 1. A chief or head; one who takes a leading part; one primarily engaged; a chief party. Seconds in factions do many times, when the faction subdivideth, prove princlý. Bacon. We are not princlýs but auxiliaries in the war. Swift. 2. A president or governor; one chief in authority; the head of a college or university in Scotland, and of several colleges in English universities, or other institutions. — 3. In law, (a) the actor or absolute perpetrator of a crime, or an abettor. A princlý in the first degree is the absolute perpetrator of the crime; a princlý in the second degree is one who is present, aiding and abetting the fact to be done: distinguished from an accessory. In treason all persons concerned are princlýs. (b) A person who employs another to act under him or for him, the person so employed being termed agent. (c) A person for whom another becomes surety; one who is liable for a debt in the first instance. — 4. In com. a capital sum lent on interest, due as a debt or used as a fund; so called in distinction to interest or profits. — 5. In music, the name of a stop or row of metal pipes in an organ tuned an octave higher than the diapason, an octave lower than the fifteenth, and serving to blend the two as well as to augment the volume of sound. All the other stops are tuned from the princlý. — 6. A main timber in an assemblage of carpentry; especially one of those rafters which are larger than the common rafters, and which are framed at their lower ends into the tiebeam, and at their upper ends are either united at the king-post or made to bear against the ends of the straining-beams when queen-posts are used. The princlýs support the purlins, which again carry the common rafters, and thus the whole weight of the roof is sustained by the princlýs.

The very princlýs did seem to read,
And all to topple. Shak.

7. In the fine arts, the chief circumstance in a work of art to which the rest are to be subordinate. — 8. One of the turrets or pinnacles of warwork and tapers with which the posts and centre of a hearse were formerly crowned. Oxford Glossary. — 9. An heirloom. Cowell.

Princlý (prins'id-pal-i-ti), n. [Fr. princlý, princlý.] 1. Sovereignty; supreme power.

Nothing was given to Henry but the name of king; all other absolute power of princlý he had. Spenser.

2. A prince; one invested with sovereignty. 'Niaroch of princlýs the prime.' Milton.

Let her be a princlý
Sovereign to all the creatures on the earth. Shak.

3. The territory of a prince, or the country which gives title to a prince; as, the princlý of Wales. — 4. Superiority; predominance.

If any mystery be effective of spiritual blessings, then this is much more, as having the prerogative and princlý above everything else. Jer. Taylor.

5. Royal state or condition. Jer. xiii. 18. Princlý (prins'id-pal-i), adv. In the princlý or chief place; chiefly; above all; as, he was anxious about many things, but princlý about this.

They wholly mistake the nature of criticism who think its business is princlý to find fault. Dryden.

Princlýness (prins'id-pal-nes), n. The state of being princlý or chief.

Princlýate (prins'id-pát), n. [L. princlý, from princeps, a prince.] Princlý; supreme rule. 'The princlý of the whole church.' Barrow.

Princlý (prins'id-pal), n. pl. [L. princlý, from princeps, a prince.] First principles; elements; the contracted title of the Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica of Newton.

Princlýant (prins'id-pal-ant), a. Relating to principles or beginnings. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Princlýate (prins'id-pát), v. t. [From L. princlý, a beginning.] To initiate.

It imports the things or effects princlý effected by the intelligent active principle. Sir M. Hale.

Princlýation (prins'id-pál-ahon), n. [From L. princlý, a principle or element.] Analysis into constituent or elemental parts. Bacon. 'A faultless princlýation of language.' Melville Bell.

Princlý (prins'id-pl), n. [Fr. princlý, from L. princlý, a beginning, origin, principle, element, from princeps, princeps. See PRINCE. As to the insertion of the i comp. participle, syllable.] 1. Beginning; commencement. 'Doubting, sad end of princlý unsound.' Spenser. Hence—2. A source or origin; that from which a thing proceeds; the primary source from which anything is, becomes, or is known; element; primordial substance. 'Found that one first princlý must be.' Dryden.

Modern philosophers suppose matter to be one simple princlý, or solid extension diversified by its various shapes. Wadell.

3. An original faculty or endowment of the mind.

Under this title are comprehended all those active princlýs whose direct and ultimate object is the communication either of enjoyment or suffering to any of our fellow-creatures. D. Stewart.

4. A general truth; a law comprehending many subordinate truths; a law on which others are founded or from which others are derived; an axiom; a maxim; as, the princlýs of morality, of law, of government, &c.

He lays down these fundamental princlýs as those of three kinds into which he divides all governments. Brougham.

Our conclusion, then, respecting the whole question of first princlýs, speculative and practical, is this, that although in their abstract form they are not innate, yet that there are innate faculties, or laws of thought which, when put into action by experience, necessarily give rise to them as primitive judgments; and that these judgments, at first applied in the concrete, at length by a process of abstraction, assume a perfect axiomatic form. Experience, accordingly, is the occasion of their production, but their real cause or origin is to be found in the native energy of the human mind. J. D. Morell.

Fâte, far, fat, fall; m&e, met, hér; pîna, pin; nôte, not, m&ve; tûbe, tub, bull; oll, pound; ù, &c. abuse; ý, &c. say.

5. A tenet; that which is believed, whether truth or not, but which serves as a rule of action or the basis of a system; a governing law of conduct; a settled rule of action, a doctrine, as, the principles of the Stoics or of the Epicureans; hence, a right rule of conduct, uprightness, as, a man of principles.

If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles Of faith, of honour.

6. Ground of conduct; a motive.

There would be but small improvements in the world were there not some common principle of action working equally with all men.

7. In chem. (a) a component part, an element; as, the constituent principles of bodies. (b) A substance, on the presence of which certain qualities, common to a number of bodies, depend. See Proximate Principles under PROXIMATE. — A principle of human nature is a law of action in human beings, a constitutional propensity common to the human species.

There are no two words in the English language used so confusedly one for the other as the words rule and principle. . . You can make a rule; you cannot make a principle; you can lay down a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, lay down a principle. It is laid down for you. You can establish a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, establish a principle. You can only declare it. Rules are within your power, principles are not. Yet the mass of mankind use the words as if they had exactly similar meanings, and choose one or the other as may best suit the rhythm of the sentence.

Principle (prin's-pl), v.t. pret. & pp. principled, ppr. principling. 1. To establish or fix in certain principles, to impress with any tenet, good or ill; used in past participle. 'With goodness principled.' Milton. 2. To establish firmly in the mind of.

Let an enthusiast be principled that he or his teacher is instructed, and you in vain bring the evidence of clear reasons against his doctrine.

Princock; Princoot (prin'kok, prin'koks), n. [From prin and cock.] A cockbird; a conceited person, a pert young rogue. Pringle (prin'g-l), n. [From Sir John Pringle, the physician and natural philosopher.] A genus of Cruciferae, the sole representative of which is P. antiscorbutica, a remarkable cabbage-like plant confined to Kerguelen's Island, and hence often called Kerguelen's Island cabbage. It is a powerful antiscorbutic, and is invaluable to the crews of ships touching at Kerguelen's Island.

Prink (prink), v.t. [A slightly modified form of prank.] 1. To prank, to dress for show. Hold a good wager she was every day longer prinking in the glass than you was. Jane Collier.

2. To strut; to put on stately airs.

Prink (prink), v.t. To deck, to adorn fantastically; to dress or adjust to ostentation; as, to prink the hair. Copper.

It is a most perilous education for a poet like Burns to prink the unadorned simplicity of his ploughman's Muse with the glittering spangles and curious lace-work of a highly polished literary style.

Prinker (prink'er), n. One who prinks; one who dresses with much care.

Prinos (prin'os), n. [Gr. prinos, the holly, which this genus much resembles.] A genus of shrubs belonging to the nat. order Aquifoliaceae. The species are natives of North America, the West Indies, and the warmer parts of Asia. Some of them are evergreen, while others are deciduous, and some have bright red holly-like berries, while in others they are purple or black. The bark and berries of P. verticillatus possess, in an eminent degree, the properties of astringent and tonic medicines, along with antiseptic powers. P. glaber is used as a substitute for tea. Called also Winter-berry.

Print (print), v.t. [Shortened from emprint, imprint; Fr. empreinte, impression, stamp, a participial form from emprimer, to print, imprint, from L. imprimere, impressum, to press (which see).] 1. To impress, to imprint. 'Printing their hoofs on the earth.' Shak. 'And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss.' Byron. — 2. To mark by pressing one thing on another.

On his fiery need besides he rode,
That scarcely prints the turf on which he trod.

3. To take an impression of; to form by impression; to stamp. 'Perhaps some foot-prints printed in the clay.' Rossetti.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh, . . . nor print any marks upon you. Lev. xix. 28.

4. To fix deeply, as in the mind or memory. And hill and wood and field did print
The same sweet forms in either mind. Tennyson.

5. In specific or technical senses. (a) to form or copy by pressure, as from a stereotype plate, a form of movable types, engraved copper or steel plates, stone, &c.; as, to print books, engravings, lithographs, &c. (b) To stamp or impress with coloured figures, as cotton cloth. See CALICO-PRINTING. (c) In photog. to take a positive picture of, as from a negative, on suitably prepared paper.

Print (print), v.t. 1. To use or practise the art of typography, or of taking impressions of letters, figures, and the like. — 2. To make books by means of the press; to publish a book.

From the moment he prints, he must expect to bear no more of truth.

Print (print), n. 1. A mark made by impression, any line, character, figure, or indentation, made by the pressure of one body or thing on another, hence, fig. a mark, vestige, or impression of any kind, a stamp.

Sheldon was esteemed a learned man before the wars, but he was now engaged so deep in politics that scarce any prints of what he had been remained.

2. Printed letters; the impressions of types in general, considered in regard to form, size, &c.; as, a small print; a large print.

The small Geneva print referred to, we apprehend, was the type used in the common copies of the Geneva translation of the Bible.

3. That which impresses its form on anything; as, a butter-print. In iron-working, a swage, a mould sunk in metal from which an impression is taken. — 4. That which is produced by printing: (a) the representation or figure of anything made by impression; specifically, an engraving. 'A collection of prints of eminent persons.' I. D'Iraetli. (b) A printed publication, more especially a newspaper or other periodical.

The prints, about three days after, were filled with the same terms.

(c) A printed cloth. (d) A plaster cast of a flat ornament, or a plaster ornament formed from a mould. Oxford Glossary. (e) In photog. a positive picture. — In print, (a) in a printed form, issued from the press; published. 'I love a ballad in print.' Shak. (b) In a formal method; with exactness; in a precise and perfect manner.

He must speak in print, walk in print, eat and drink in print.

— Out of print, a phrase which signifies that, of a printed and published work, there are no copies for sale, or none for sale by the publisher.

Printed-goods (print'ed-guds), n.pl. Printed or figured calicoes.

Printer (print'er), n. One who prints books, pamphlets, newspapers, and such like; also, one who prints cloth, or one who takes im-

on paper, cloth, or other material: the business of a printer; typography. There are several distinct branches of the art, as the printing of books, &c., with movable types, typography, the printing of engraved copper or steel plates (see ENGRAVING); the taking of impressions from stone (see LITHOGRAPHY), and the impressing of a fabric with coloured designs (see CALICO-PRINTING.) The most important branch of printing is what is called letterpress printing, or the method of taking impressions from letters and other characters cast or cut in relief upon separate pieces of metal, and therefore capable of indefinite combination. The impressions are taken either directly from the type surface or from stereotype plates (see STEREOTYPE), and are effected either by superficial or surface pressure, as in the hand printing-press, or by lineal or cylindrical pressure, as in the printing-machine, or by the action of a roller, as in the copperplate-press or roller-press. The pigments or inks, of whatever colour, are always laid upon the surface of the types or stereotype plate. Wood-cuts and other engravings in relief are also printed in this manner. In copper and steel plate printing the characters are engraved in intaglio, and the inks contained within the lines of the engravings, and not upon the surface of the plate. Cotton or calico printing is from surfaces engraved either in relief or in intaglio. The art of letterpress printing, which was invented by Gutenberg at Mentz, about the year 1450, is divided into two departments — composition, or the arrangement of the types, and press-work, or the taking off impressions from the types so arranged, the workmen employed are therefore distinguished into two classes — compositors and pressmen. Printing was first introduced into England by William Caxton about 1474. — 2. In photog. the act or art of obtaining a positive photographic picture from a negative, or a picture in which the lights and shades are true to nature from one in which they are reversed.

Printing-frame (print'ing-fram), n. 1. In letterpress printing, a stand to support the cases containing types at which a compositor works. — 2. In photog. a quadrangular shallow box in which sensitized paper is placed beneath a negative and exposed to the direct rays of light.

Printing-ink (print'ing-ink), n. Ink used by printers of books. Its composition, generally speaking, is linseed-oil boiled to a varnish, with colouring matter added to it.

Printing-machine (print'ing-ma-shén), n. A machine for taking impressions from type, electrotypes, or stereotype forms, steel or copper plates, lithographic stones, &c. Printing-machines include a self-inking apparatus; and they are moved either by hand, steam, or other power. In most cases the impression taken from the 'forms' worked by them is effected by a cylinder or several cylinders, in others by a flat press, like the press platen. The first self-acting printing-machine dates from a patent of W. Nicholson in 1790, the next practical attempt was made in 1804, at the expense of the late Mr. Walter of the Times, by T. Martyn. But the first working machine was constructed ten years afterwards by two ingenious Germans, Messrs. Koenig and Bauer. On this machine the Times of Nov. 29, 1814, was printed by steam, at the rate of 1100 impressions per hour. Since then successive improvements have raised the amount on that and other presses from engraved plates, from stone, &c.; but in the latter cases this word is the second element in a compound rather than a separate word; as, calico-printer; lithographic-printer.

Printer's-devil (print'ers-de-vil), n. The newest apprentices lad in a printing-office.

Printer's-ink (print'ers-ink), n. See PRINTING-INK.

Printery (print'ér-í), n. An establishment for printing cottons, &c.; also, a printing-office. [United States.]

Print-raid (print'fild), n. A print-work; an establishment for printing and bleaching calicoes.

Printing (print'ing), n. 1. The art or practice of impressing letters, characters, or figures

Primum Mobile (prí'mum mob't-í-lé). [L.] First cause of motion; prime mover; specifically, in the Ptolemaic system, the tenth or outermost of the revolving spheres of the universe, which was supposed to revolve from east to west in twenty-four hours, and to carry the others along with it in its motion.

Primus (prí'mus). n. [L., first.] The first in dignity among the bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church. He is chosen by the other bishops, presides at all their meetings, and has certain other privileges, but possesses no metropolitan authority.

Primwort (prím'wört). n. Any plant of the nat. order Primulacæ. Pop. Envy.

Primty (prím'ti). a. Blooming; early. 'In the youth of primty nature.' Shak.

Prince (prins). n. [Fr., from L. princeps, princeps, a prince—primus, first, and capio, to take.] 1. One holding the first or highest rank; a sovereign; the chief and independent ruler of a nation or state. Originally the word was applied to a ruler of either sex.

Then we cried, 'God save your Majesty! God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen turned and said, 'God bless you all, my good people.' Then we cried again, 'God save your Majesty!' Then the Queen said again to us, 'You may well have a greater, but you shall never have a more loving Prince.' Sp. Goodman.

2. A sovereign who has the government of a particular state or territory, but holds of a superior to whom he owes certain services.

3. The son of a sovereign, or the issue of a royal family; as, princes of the blood. On the Continent the title prince is borne by some families of eminent rank not immediately connected with any reigning house. In Britain, dukes, marquesses, and earls are entitled, in strict heraldic language, to the title of prince; but in practice the title is restricted to members of the royal family. The only case in which the title is a territorial one is that of the Prince of Wales.—4. The chief of any body of men; one who is at the head of any class, profession, &c.; one who is pre-eminent in anything; as, a merchant prince.

To use the words of the prince of learning hereupon, only in shallow and small boats they glide over the face of the Virgilian sea. Beckham.

—Prince of the senate, in anc. Rome, was the person first called in the roll of senators. He was always of consular and censorian dignity.

Prince (prins), v. i. pret. princied; ppr. princing. To play the prince; to take state: with a complementary tu.

Nature prompts them
In simple and low things to prince it much
Beyond the trick of others. Shak.

Princeps (prins's). n. The body of the princeps. Month. Rev. [Rare.]

Princedom (prins'dum). n. The jurisdiction, rank, or estate of a prince.

Under thee, as head supreme,
Thrones, *princedom*s, powers, dominions, I reduce. Milton.

Princite (prins'it). n. A follower of Henry James Prince, formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, who founded a conventual establishment of a singular kind, called 'Agapemone,' or the abode of love. The inmates consist of persons of both sexes, and profess to submit themselves only to the law of love.

Princelike (prins'lik). a. Becoming a prince; like a prince. Shak.

Princeliness (prins'li-nes). n. The quality of being princely.

Princeling (prins'ling). n. A petty prince. Young.

Princely (prins'li). a. 1. Pertaining to a prince; having the rank of a prince; royal; regal. 'His princely name.' Shak. 'His princely feet.' Shak.—2. Resembling a prince; having the appearance of one high born; stately; dignified; high-minded; noble. He is as full of valour as of kindness; Princely in both. Shak.

3. Becoming a prince; royal; grand; august; magnificent; magnificent; as, princely virtues; a princely gift; a princely entertainment; a princely fortune.

Ay, beauty's princely majesty is such,
Confounds the tongue and makes the senses rough. Shak.

Princely (prins'li), adv. In a princelike manner. Shak.

Prince-royal (prins-roi'al). n. The eldest son of a sovereign.

Prince's-feather (prins-sez-fer'hér). n. An annual plant of the genus Amaranthus, the A. hypochondriacus. The larger prince's-feather is A. speciosus.

Prince's-metal (prins-sez-met-al). n. A mixture of copper and zinc, in which the proportion of zinc is greater than in brass: said to have been invented by Prince Rupert, and so called also Prince Rupert's Metal.

Prince's-pine (prins-sez-pin). n. The false winter-green (Chimaphila umbellata), an ornamental shrub with pinkish flowers, common in North America.

Princess (prins'es). n. 1. A female sovereign; a female having the rank of a prince. 'So excellent a princess as the present queen.' Swift.—2. The daughter of a sovereign, or a female member of a royal family.

3. The consort of a prince; as, the Princess of Wales.

Princess-like (prins'es-lik). a. Like a princess; in the manner of a princess.

Princessly (prins'es-li). a. Princess-like. Byron. [Rare.]

Princess-royal (prins-sez-roi'al). n. The eldest daughter of a sovereign.

Princewood (prins'wud). n. A light-veined brown West Indian wood, the produce of Cordia gerascanthoides and Hamelia ventricosa. Treas. of Bot.

Princified (prins'i-fid). a. Imitating a prince; suggestive of an exalted personage; fantastically dignified.

The English girls . . . laughed at the princified airs which she gave herself from a very early age. Thackeray.

Principal (prin'si-pal). a. [Fr.; L. principalis, from princeps, first in time or order, the first. See PRINCE.] 1. Chief; highest in rank, character, authority, or importance; first; main; essential; most considerable; as, the principal officers of a government; the principal men of a city, town, or state; the principal arguments in a case; the principal beams of a building; the principal productions of a country. 'Wisdom is the principal thing.' Prov. iv. 7. 'The principal men of the army.' Shak.—2. Of or pertaining to a prince; princely. Spenser.—Principal axis, in conic sections, the axis which passes through the two foci; in the parabola, the diameter passing through the focus.—Principal brace, in carp. one immediately under the principal rafters, or parallel to them, assisting with the principals to support the roof timbers.—Principal challenge, in law, is where the cause assigned carries with it prima facie evidence of partiality, favour, or malice.—Principal post, the corner-post of a timber-framed house.—Principal ray, that which passes perpendicularly from the spectator's eye to the perspective plane or picture.—Principal rafters, the strong rafters used for trussing the beams in a roof. See under the noun PRINCIPAL, 6.—Principal section, in crystal, a plane passing through the optical axis of a crystal.—Principal subject or theme, in music, one of the chief subjects of a movement in sonata form, as opposed to a subordinate theme.—SYN. Chief, leading, main, great, capital, cardinal, essential.

Principal (prin'si-pal). n. 1. A chief or head; one who takes a leading part; one primarily engaged; a chief party.

Seconds in factions do many times, when the faction subdivideth, prove principals. Bacon.

We are not principals but auxiliaries in the war. Swift.

2. A president or governor; one chief in authority; the head of a college or university in Scotland, and of several colleges in English universities, or other institutions.—3. In law, (a) the actor or absolute perpetrator of a crime, or an abettor. A principal in the first degree is the absolute perpetrator of the crime; a principal in the second degree is one who is present, aiding and abetting the fact to be done; distinguished from an accessory. In treason all persons concerned are principals. (b) A person who employs another to act under him or for him, the person so employed being termed agent. (c) A person for whom another becomes surety; one who is liable for a debt in the first instance.—4. In com. a capital sum lent on interest, due as a debt or used as a fund: so called in distinction to interest or profits.—5. In music, the name of a stop or row of metal pipes in an organ tuned an octave higher than the diapason, an octave lower than the fifteenth, and serving to blend the two as well as to augment the volume of sound. All the other stops are tuned from the principal.—6. A main timber in an assemblage of carpentry; especially one of those rafters which are larger than the common rafters, and which are framed at their lower ends into the tiebeam, and at their upper ends are either united at the king-post or made to bear against the ends of the straining-beams when queen-posts are used. The principals support the purlins, which again carry the common rafters, and thus the whole weight of the roof is sustained by the principals.

The very principals did seem to read,
And all to topple. Shak.

7. In the fine arts, the chief circumstance in a work of art to which the rest are to be subordinate.—8. One of the turrets or pinnacles of waxwork and tapers with which the poets and centre of a hearse were formerly crowned. Oxford Glossary.—9.† An heirloom. Cowell.

Principality (prin-si-pal'i-ti). n. [Fr. principauté.] 1. Sovereignty; supreme power. Nothing was given to Henry but the name of king; all other absolute power of principality he had. Spenser.

2. A prince; one invested with sovereignty. 'Niaroch of principality the prime.' Milton.

Let her be a principality
Sovereign to all the creatures on the earth. Shak.

3. The territory of a prince, or the country which gives title to a prince; as, the principality of Wales.—4.† Superiority; predominance.

If any mystery be effective of spiritual blessings, then this is much more, as having the prerogative and principality above everything else. Jer. Taylor.

5. Royal state or condition. Jer. xiii. 18.

Principally (prin-si-pal-i), adv. In the principal or chief place; chiefly; above all; as, he was anxious about many things, but principally about this.

They wholly mistake the nature of criticism who think its business is principally to find fault. Dryden.

Principality (prin-si-pal-nes). n. The state of being principal or chief.

Principate (prin-si-pát). n. [L. principatus, from princeps, a prince.] Principality; supreme rule. 'The principate of the whole church.' Barrow.

Principia (prin-si-pli). n. pl. [L. principium.] First principles; elements: the contracted title of the Philosophia Naturalis Principia Mathematica of Newton.

Principial (prin-si-pli). a. Elementary; initial. Bacon.

Principiant (prin-si-pli-ant). a. Relating to principles or beginnings. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Principiate (prin-si-pli-át). v. t. [From L. principium, a beginning.] To initiate.

It imports the things or effects principiated or effected by the intelligent active principle. W. H. Hall.

Principiation (prin-si-pli-á-shon). n. [From L. principium, a principle or element.] Analysis into constituent or elemental parts. Bacon. 'A faultless principiation of language.' Melville Bell.

Principle (prin-si-pli). n. [Fr. principe, from L. principium, a beginning, origin, principle, element, from princeps, princeps. See PRINCE.] As to the insertion of the i comp. participle, syllable.] 1.† Beginning; commencement. 'Doubting, and end of principles unsound.' Spenser. Hence—2. A source or origin; that from which a thing proceeds; the primary source from which anything is, becomes, or is known; element; primordial substance. 'Found that one first principle must be.' Dryden.

Modern philosophers suppose matter to be one simple principle, or solid extension diversified by its various shapes. Hall.

3. An original faculty or endowment of the mind.

Under this title are comprehended all those active principles whose direct and ultimate object is the communication either of enjoyment or suffering to any of our fellow-creatures. D. Stewart.

4. A general truth; a law comprehending many subordinate truths; a law on which others are founded or from which others are derived; an axiom; a maxim; as, the principles of morality, of law, of government, &c.

He lays down these fundamental principles as those of three kinds into which he divides all governments. Brougham.

Our conclusion, then, respecting the whole question of first principles, speculative and practical, is this, that although in their abstract form they are not innate, yet that there are innate faculties, or laws of thought which, when put into action by experience, necessarily give rise to them as primitive judgments; and that these judgments, at first applied in the concrete, at length by a process of abstraction, assume a perfect axiomatic form. Experience, accordingly, is the occasion of their production, but their real cause or origin is to be found in the native energy of the human mind. J. D. Morell.

6. A tenet; that which is believed, whether truth or not, but which serves as a rule of action or the basis of a system; a governing law of conduct; a settled rule of action; a doctrine; as, the principles of the Stoics or of the Epicureans; hence, a right rule of conduct, uprightness; as, a man of principles.

*I'll try
If yet I can subdue those stubborn principles
Of faith, of honour.*

8. Ground of conduct; a motive.

There would be but small improvements in the world were there not some common principles of action working equally with all men.

7 In chem. (a) a component part; an element; as, the constituent principles of bodies. (b) A substance, on the presence of which certain qualities, common to a number of bodies, depend. See Proximate Principles under PROXIMATE. — A principle of human nature is a law of action in human beings, a constitutional propensity common to the human species.

There are no two words in the English language used so confusedly one for the other as the words rule and principle. You can make a rule; you cannot make a principle; you can lay down a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, lay down a principle. It is laid down for you. You can establish a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, establish a principle. You can only declare it. Rules are within your power, principles are not. Yet the mass of mankind use the words as if they had exactly similar meanings, and choose one or the other as may best suit the rhythm of the sentence.

Principle (prin-si-pl), v.t. prek & pp. principled, ppr. principling. 1. To establish or fix in certain principles; to impress with any tenet, good or ill; used in past participle. 'With goodness principled.' Milton. 2. To establish firmly in the mind of.

Let an enthusiast be principled that he or his teacher is inspired, and you in vain bring the evidence of clear reasons against his doctrine. Lodge.

Princock, Princock (prin'kok, prin'koks), n. [From and cock.] A cockbird; a conceited person; a pert young rogue. Shak.

Pringle (prin'le-a), n. [From Sir John Pringle, the physician and natural philosopher.] A genus of Cruciferae, the sole representative of which is P. antiscorbutica, a remarkable cabbage-like plant confined to Kerguelen's island, and hence often called Kerguelen's island cabbage. It is a powerful antiscorbutic, and is invaluable to the crews of ships touching at Kerguelen's island.

Prink (prink), v.t. [A slightly modified form of prank.] 1. To prank; to dress for show.

Hold a good wager she was every day longer prinking in the glass than you was. Jane Collier.

2. To strut; to put on stately airs.

Prink (prink), v.t. 2. To deck; to adorn fantastically, to dress or adjust to ostentation; as, to prink the hair. Cowper.

It is a most perilous education for a poet like Burns to prink the unadorned simplicity of his ploughman's Muse with the glittering tangles and curious lace-work of a highly polished literary style.

Prinker (prink'er), n. One who prinks; one who dresses with much care.

Prinos (pri'nos), n. [Gr. prinos, the holly, which this genus much resembles.] A genus of shrubs belonging to the nat. order Aquifoliaceae. The species are natives of North America, the West India, and the warmer parts of Asia. Some of them are evergreen, while others are deciduous, and some have bright red holly-like berries, while in others they are purple or black. The bark and berries of P. verticillatus possess, in an eminent degree, the properties of astringent and tonic medicines, along with antiscorbutic powers. P. glaber is used as a substitute for tea. Called also Winter-berry.

Print (print), v.t. [Shortened from emprint, imprint; Fr. emprimer, impression, stamp, a participial form from emprimer, to print, imprint, from L. imprimere, impressum, to press (with see).] 1. To impress; to imprint. 'Printing their hoofs on the earth.' Shak. 'And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss.' Byron. — 2. To mark by pressing one thing on another.

On his bery steeled between he rode,
That scarcely prints the turf on which he trod.

3. To take an impression of; to form by impression, to stamp. 'Perhaps some foot-steps printed in the clay.' Roscommon.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh;
Nor print any marks upon you. Lev. xix. 28.

4. To fix deeply, as in the mind or memory. And hill and wood and field did print
The same sweet focus in either mind. Tranyson.

5. In specific or technical senses: (a) to form or copy by pressure, as from a stereotype plate, a form of movable types, engraved copper or steel plates, stone, &c.; as, to print books, engravings, lithographs, &c. (b) To stamp or impress with coloured figures, as cotton cloth. See CALICO-PRINTING. (c) In photog. to take a positive picture of, as from a negative, on suitably prepared paper.

Print (print), v.t. 1. To use or practise the art of typography, or of taking impressions of letters, figures, and the like. — 2. To make books by means of the press; to publish a book.

From the moment he prints, he must expect to hear no more of truth.

Print (print), n. 1. A mark made by impression; any line, character, figure, or indentation, made by the pressure of one body or thing on another; hence, fig. a mark, vestige, or impression of any kind, a stamp.

Sheldon was esteemed a learned man before the wars, but he was now engaged so deep in politics that scarce any prints of what he had been remained.

2. Printed letters; the impressions of types in general, considered in regard to form, size, &c.; as, a small print; a large print.

The small Geneva print referred to, we apprehend, was the type used in the common copies of the Geneva translation of the Bible.

3. That which impresses its form on anything; as, a butter-print. In iron-working, a swage; a mould sunk in metal from which an impression is taken. — 4. That which is produced by printing: (a) the representation or figure of anything made by impression; specifically, an engraving. 'A collection of prints of eminent persons.' J. D'Iseroff. (b) A printed publication, more especially a newspaper or other periodical.

The prints, about three days after, were filled with the same terms.

(c) A printed cloth. (d) A plaster cast of a flat ornament, or a plaster ornament formed from a mould. Oxford Glossary. (e) In photog. a positive picture. — In print, (a) in a printed form, issued from the press; published. 'I love a ballad in print.' Shak. (b) In a formal method; with exactness; in a precise and perfect manner.

He must speak in print, walk in print, eat and drink in print.

— Out of print, a phrase which signifies that, of a printed and published work, there are no copies for sale, or none for sale by the publisher.

Printed-goods (print'ed-gudz), n.pl. Printed or figured calicoes.

Printer (print'er), n. One who prints books, pamphlets, newspapers, and such like; also, one who prints cloth, or one who takes im-

on paper, cloth, or other material; the business of a printer; typography. There are several distinct branches of the art, as the printing of books, &c., with movable types, typography; the printing of engraved copper or steel plates (see ENGRAVING); the taking of impressions from stone (see LITHOGRAPHY), and the impressing of a fabric with coloured designs (see CALICO-PRINTING). The most important branch of printing is what is called letterpress printing, or the method of taking impressions from letters and other characters cast or cut in relief upon separate pieces of metal, and therefore capable of indefinite combination. The impressions are taken either directly from the type surface or from stereotype plates (see STEREOTYPE), and are effected either by superficial or surface pressure, as in the hand printing-press, or by linear or cylindrical pressure, as in the printing-machine, or by the action of a roller, as in the copperplate-press or roller-press. The pigments or inks, of whatever colour, are always laid upon the surface of the types or stereotype plate. Wood-cuts and other engravings in relief are also printed in this manner. In copper and steel plate printing the characters are engraved in intaglio, and the inks contained within the lines of the engravings, and not upon the surface of the plate. Cotton or calico printing is from surfaces engraved either in relief or in intaglio. pressions from engraved plates, from stones, &c.; but in the latter cases this word is the second element in a compound rather than a separate word; as, calico-printer; lithographic-printer.

Printer's-devil (print'ers-de-vil), n. The newest apprentice lad in a printing-office.

Printer's-ink (print'ers-ingk), n. See PRINTING-INK.

Printery (print'ers-j), n. An establishment for printing cottons, &c.; also, a printing-office. [United States.]

Print-field (print'fild), n. A print-work; an establishment for printing and bleaching calicoes.

Printing (print'ing), n. 1. The art or practice of impressing letters, characters, or figures paratus; and they are moved either by hand, steam, or other power. In most cases the impression taken from the 'forms' worked by them is effected by a cylinder or several cylinders, in others by a flat press, like the press platen. The first self-acting printing-machine dates from a patent of W. Nicholson in 1790; the next practical attempt was made in 1804, at the expense of the late Mr. Walter of the Times, by T. Martyn. But the first working machine was constructed ten years afterwards by two ingenious Germans, Messrs. Koenig and Bauer. On this machine the Times of Nov. 29, 1814, was printed by steam, at the rate of 1100 impressions per hour. Since then successive improvements have raised the amount on that and other journals to between 20,000 and 30,000 copies an hour. The printing-machine is now in use almost everywhere for nearly all kinds of printing whenever speed and economy are desirable. The engraving shows the well-known double-cylinder perfecting machine, which embodies the principle of Koenig and Bauer's. The blank sheet a is caught by a series of endless tapes and held in position round the large revolving cylinder b, under which is run the form of types previously inked by the rollers c. By means of the smaller intermediate cylinders d and e the half-printed sheet is passed to the second large cylinder f, when its other side is printed, and the perfected sheet is delivered between the two cylinders f.

Printing-office, Printing-house (print'-ing-of-iss, print'-ing-hous), n. A house or office where letterpress printing is executed.

and sharp equally sharp, they never require to be turned round in order to change their course, but all equally well in either direction. They are often formed of two pieces of wood joined lengthways, and sewed together with bark. One side of the proba is flat and in a straight line from stem to stem, but the other is rounded as in other vessels. This shape, with their small breadth, would render them very liable to heel over, were it not for the outrigger, adjusted sometimes to the leeward side and sometimes to both sides.

Probatum (prō'bā-tūm), n. [Gr. pro, before, and baui, a hall.] In arab. a vestibule.

Probabilis causam (prō-bā-bī-lis k'āz'am), n. [L.] A probable cause.—Probabilis causam disputandi, in Scots law, plausible ground of action or defence.

Probabilium (prō'bā-bī-lī-ūm), n. In Rom. Cath. theol. a theory, according to which it is lawful to follow a probable opinion in doubtful points, or that which is incited by teachers of authority, although other opinions may seem to the mind of the inquirer more probable.

Advocate and antagonist will admit that the system of law opinion regularly charged against the Scots division rests on three cardinal propositions—of probation, of moral reservation, and justification of means by the end.

Probabilist (prō'bā-bī-lis-t), n. 1. One who maintains that a man may do what is probably right, or is incited by teachers of authority, although it may not be the most probably right, or may not seem right to himself.—2. A term applied to one who maintains that certainty is impossible, and that probability alone is to govern our faith and practice.

Probability (prō'bā-bī-lī-ti), n. [Fr. probabilité, L. probabilis. See PROBABLE.] 1. The state or quality of being probable, likelihood; appearance of truth; that state of a case or question of fact which results from superior evidence or preponderation of argument on one side, inclining the mind to receive it as the truth, but leaving some room for doubt.

Probability is the appearance of the agreement or disagreement of two ideas, by the intervention of goods whose connection is not constant, but appears for the most part to be so.

2. Anything that has the appearance of reality or truth. [In this sense the word admits of the plural number.]

The whole life of man is a perpetual comparison of evidence and balancing of probabilities.

Richardson.

—Probability, in math. is the ratio of the number of chances by which an event may happen, to the number by which it may both happen and fail. The theory of probability, a very extensive and important application of analysis, has for its object the determination of the number of ways in which a future or uncertain event may happen or fail, in order that we may be enabled to judge whether the chances of its happening or failing are the greater, and in what proportion. See CHANCE.

Probable (prō'bā-bī), a. [Fr. probable, from L. probabilis, that may be proved, probable, from probo, to prove. See PROVE.] 1. Having more evidence for than against, or evidence which inclines the mind to believe, but leaves some room for doubt, likely.

That is accounted probable which has better arguments probantes for it than can be brought against it.

I do not say that the principles of religion are probable, I have before asserted them to be morally certain.

Sp. Williams.

1. Rendering something probable; as, probable evidence; a probable presumption. Blackstone.—Probable evidence, evidence distinguished from demonstrative evidence by this, that it admits of degrees, and of all variety of them from the highest moral certainty to the very lowest presumption.—2. Capable of being proved. 'Traditions or opinions not probable by scripture.' Newton.

4. Plausible, specious; colourable.—Probable error, in astron. and physics, when the value of any quantity or element has been determined by means of a number of independent observations, each liable to a small amount of error, the determination will also be liable to some uncertainty, and the probable error is the quantity which is such that there is the same probability of the difference between the determination and the true absolute value of the thing to be determined, exceeding or falling short of it.—Probable cause, in Scots law, a plausible ground of action or defence.

Probably (prō'bā-bī), adv. In a probable manner; in all likelihood; with the appearance of truth or reality, likely, as, the story is probably true; the account is probably correct.

Distinguish between what may possibly, and what will probably be done.

See R. L. Estlin.

Probal (prō'bāl), a. Probable.

This advice is true, I give, and honest.

Probal to thinking, and indeed the converse.

To visit the Mount again.

Probang (prō'bang), n. In very a long slender elastic rod of whalebone, with a piece of sponge securely attached to one end, intended to push down extraneous bodies arrested in the throat or oesophagus into the stomach. There are also probangs for application to the domestic animals.

Probans (prō'bāns), n. [L. probans, from probo, to prove.] 1. Pro. Shulton.—2. In law, official proof of a will. This is obtained by the executor in the probate branch of the high court of justice, and is either in 'common form' or 'per testes,' in solemn form of law. When the will is so proved the original must be deposited in the registry of the court, and a copy of it on parchment is made out under its seal, and delivered to the executor, together with a certificate of its having been proved, all which together is usually styled the probate. Wharton.

Probate (prō'bāt), a. Relating to the proof or establishment of wills and testaments, as, probate duties.

Probate-duty (prō'bāt-dū-ti), n. A tax on property passing by will.

Probation (prō'bā-shūn), n. [L. probatio, probationis, an approving.] 1. The act of proving; proof.

The kinds of probation for several things being as much disproportioned as the objects of the several seems are to one another.

Sp. Williams.

2. Any proceeding designed to ascertain truth, character, qualifications, or the like; trial; examination; especially, (a) the year of trial or the novitiate, which a person must pass in a convent to prove his or her virtue and ability to bear the severities of the rule.

See . . . may be a man without probation.

Barn. & F.

(b) Moral trial; the state of man in the present life, in which he has the opportunity of proving his character and being qualified for a happier state.

Probation will end with the present life.

R. Nelson.

(c) The trial of a clergyman's qualifications as a minister of the gospel preparatory to his settlement; as, he is preaching on probation.

Probationary (prō'bā-shūn-ā-ri), a. Serving for trial or probation.

Their offices are not paul, but medicinal, or probationary.

Sp. Richardson.

Probationary (prō'bā-shūn-ā-ri), a. Pertaining to probation, embracing or serving for trial or probation.

All the probationary work of man is ended when death arrives.

Douglas.

Probationer (prō'bā-shūn-ēr), n. 1. One who is on probation or trial; one who is placed so that he may give proof of certain qualifications for a place or state; a novice.

While yet a young probationer,

And candidate of heaven.

Dryden.

Proacious (prô-kâ'shus), a. [L. proax, proacis, forward, pert.] Pert; petulant; saucy. 'Spill the blood of that proacious Christian.' Barrow.

Proacity (prô-kâ'si-ti), n. [L. proacitas.] Impudence; petulance.

In vain are all your knaveries,
Delights, deceits, proacities. Burton.

Procatartotic (prô-kat-ârk'tik), a. [Gr. prokatarthô, to begin first—pro, before, kata, used intensively, and arthô, to begin.] In med. appellative of a cause which immediately kindles a disease into action when there existed a predisposition to it. The procatartotic cause is often denominated the exciting cause.

Procatartix (prô-kat-ârk'sis), n. In med. the kindling of a disease into action by a procatartotic cause, when a predisposition exists; the procatartotic cause itself of a disease.

Pro-cathedral (prô-ka-thê'dral), n. A church that serves temporarily as a cathedral.

Procedendo (prô-sê-den'dô), n. [L.] In law, a writ which formerly issued out of the common-law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, when judges of any subordinate court delayed the parties, and would not give judgment either on the one side or on the other, when they ought to have done so. It commanded the judges to proceed to give judgment, but without specifying any particular judgment. A writ of procedendo also lay where an action had been removed from an inferior to a superior court, and it appeared to the superior court that it was removed on insufficient grounds.

Procedure (prô-sêd'ûr), n. [Fr. procédure. See PROCEED.] 1.† The act of proceeding or moving forward; progress.

He overcame the difficulty in defiance of all such pretences as were made even from religion itself to obstruct the better procedure of real and material religion. Jer. Taylor.

2. Manner of proceeding or acting; a course or mode of action; conduct; as, his procedure was very strange; the procedure followed in courts of law. 'Those more complex intellectual procedures which acute thinkers have ever employed.' H. Spencer.—3. A step taken; an act performed; a proceeding. 4.† That which proceeds from something; produce. 'No known substance but earth, and the procedures of earth, as tile and stone.' Bacon.—SYN. Process, operation, transaction, course, conduct, management.

Proceed (prô-sêd'), v. t. [Fr. procéder; L. pro-cedo—pro, before, and cedo, to go. See CEDERE.] 1. To move, pass, or go forward or onward; to continue or renew motion or progress; to advance; to go on; as, to proceed on one's journey; the vessel stopped two days and then proceeded on her voyage.—2. To pass from one point, stage, or topic to another.

I shall proceed to more complex ideas. Locke.

3. To issue or come, as from an origin, source, or fountain; to go forth; as, light proceeds from the sun; vice proceeds from a depraved heart.—4. To carry on some series of actions; to set to work and go on in a certain way and for some particular purpose; to act according to some method.

From them I will not hide
My judgments, how with mankind I proceed. Milton.

He that proceeds on other principles in his inquiry into any sciences, posts himself in a party. Locke.

5.† To be transacted or carried on; to be done; to pass.

He will, after his sour fashion, tell you

What hath proceeded worthy note to-day. Shak.

Process (prô'ses), n. [L. processus, from pro-cedo, processus, to proceed. See PROCEED.]

1. A proceeding or moving forward; progressive course. Hooker.—2. Way of proceeding or happening; way in which something goes on; gradual progress; course. 'The fatal process of war.' Dryden.

Command me to your honourable wife;
Tell her the process of Antonio's end. Shak.

3. Operations or treatment applied to something; series of actions or experiments; as, a chemical process; a manufacturing process.—4. Series of motions or changes going on, as in growth, decay, &c., in physical bodies; as, the process of vegetation or of mineralization; the process of decomposition.—5. Course; lapse; a passing or elapsing; as, the process of time. 'In process of the seasons.' Shak. 'In the course and process of this time.' Shak.—6. In law, a term applied, in its widest sense, to the whole course of proceedings in a cause, real or personal, civil or criminal, from the original writ to the end of the suit; properly, the summons by which one is cited into a court, as being the principal part of the proceedings, by which the rest is directed. Formerly the superior common-law courts, in the case of personal actions, differed greatly in their modes of process, but since the passing of the Process Uniformity Act all personal actions except replevin are begun in the same way in all the courts, namely, by a writ of summons. In chancery suits the ordinary process is by service of a copy of the bill or claim, with an endorsed citation, which requires the defendant to appear on a certain day. The mode of commencing an ecclesiastical suit and bringing the parties before the court is by process, called a citation or summons, containing the name of the judge, the plaintiff and defendant, the cause of complaint, and the time and place of appearance. In criminal causes, if the accused is not already in custody, the process, in the case of treason, felony, or misdemeanour, is a capias to bring him before the court.—Final process is the writ of execution used to carry the judgment into effect. In Scots law, process is used for the proceedings in a cause, and for the connected documents.—7. A projecting portion of something; especially, in anat. any protuberance, eminence, or projecting part of a bone or other body; as, the mastoid process; the ciliary process, &c.

Process, † n. Progress. Chaucer.

Procession (prô-sê'shon), n. [Fr., from L. processio. See PROCEED.] 1. The act of proceeding or issuing forth or from. 'The Word of God by generation, the Holy Ghost by procession.' Bp. Pearson.—2. A train of persons walking, or riding on horseback or in vehicles, in a formal march, or moving with ceremonious solemnity. 'Homer with all his pomp of military processions, and his flash of hostile encounter.' Prof. Blackie.

Him all his train
Follow'd in bright procession. Milton.

—Procession of the Holy Ghost, in theol. that doctrine regarding the third person of the Trinity which teaches that as the Son proceeds (or is born) from the Father, so the Holy Ghost proceeds (or emanates) from the Father and from the Son, but as from one principle.

Professedly (prō-fes'ed-lī), adv. By profession; avowedly; by open declaration or avowal.

I could not grant too much to men . . . professedly my subjects. Bishop Basilide.

England I travelled over, professedly searching all places as I passed along. Woodward.

Profession (prō-fesh'ion), n. [Fr., from L. professio, professionis, a declaration.] 1. The act of professing; open declaration; public avowal or acknowledgment of one's sentiments or belief. 'That solemn profession of faith and repentance which all Christians make in baptism.' Tillotson.—2. That which is professed; a declaration; a representation or protestation; pretence; as, professions of friendship or sincerity. 'Most profiggantly false with the strongest professions of sincerity.' Swift.—3. The business which one professes to understand and to follow for subsistence; a calling superior to a mere trade or handicraft; vocation; employment; as, the three learned professions of divinity, physic, and law.

He tried five or six professions in turn, without success. Macaulay.

4. The collective body of persons engaged in a calling; as, practices honourable or disgraceful to a profession; to be at the head of one's profession.—5. In the R. Cath. Ch. the entering into a religious order, by which a person offers himself to God by a vow of inviolable obedience, chastity, and poverty. SYN. Acknowledgment, avowal, assertion, representation, pretence, calling, vocation, employment, avocation, occupation, office.

Professional (prō-fesh'ion-āl), a. 1. Pertaining to a profession or to a calling; as, professional studies, pursuits, duties, engagements; professional character or skill.—2. Engaged in a profession.

Such marks of confidence must be very gratifying to a professional man. Dickens.

Professional (prō-fesh'ion-āl), n. In a general sense, a member of any profession or art, but more often applied, in opposition to the term amateur, to persons who make their living by arts, &c., in which non-professionals are accustomed to engage. The term thus more specifically designates professional singers, musicians, actors, cricketers, rowers, boxers, and the like.

He is a musical man, an Amateur, but might have been a Professional. He is an Artist, too; an Amateur; but might have been a Professional. Dickens.

Professionalist (prō-fesh'ion-āl-ist), n. One who practises or belongs to some profession. [Rare.]

Professionally (prō-fesh'ion-āl-lī), adv. In a professional manner; by or in the way of one's profession or calling; as, one employed professionally.

Profession, n. The monastic profession. Chaucer.

Professor (prō-fes'ēr), n. [L.] 1. One who makes open declaration of his sentiments or opinions; particularly, one who makes a public avowal of his belief in the Scriptures and his faith in Christ, and thus unites himself to the visible church; also, one who professes or affects uncommon sanctity; one who is visibly or ostensibly religious.

When the holiness of the professors of religion is decayed, you may doubt the springing up of a new sect. Bacon.

It was supposed that this appointment would conciliate the rigid Presbyterians; for Crawford was what they call a professor. His letters and speeches are, to use his own phraseology, exceeding savoury. Sir W. Scott.

2. One that publicly teaches any art, science, or branch of learning; particularly, an official in a university, college, or other seminary, whose business is to deliver lectures or instruct students in a particular branch of learning; as, a professor of theology or mathematics. In Oxford and Cambridge, the professors, and the instruction which they convey by lectures, are only auxiliaries instead of principals, the necessary business of instruction being carried on by the tutors connected with the several colleges. In the universities of Scotland and Germany, on the other hand, the professors are at once the governing body and the sole recognized functionaries for the purposes of education. [In this use the word has come to be much more extensively and loosely applied than formerly, and now not only have we professors of music, dancing, &c., but itinerating expounders and demonstrators of so-called sciences, exhibitors of feats of dexterity, posturing, conjuring tricks, and the like, corn curers, quack herbalists, teachers of boxing, and many others of a similar character, frequently assume this much-abused title. On the Continent the title is given to teachers of special branches in boarding and other schools.]

Professorial (prô-fes-sô-ri-al), a. Pertaining to a university professor; as, the professorial chair.

Professorialism (prô-fes-sô-ri-al-izm), n. The character or prevailing mode of thinking or acting of university professors. [Rare.]

In engin. and surv. A vertical section through a work or section of country, to show the elevations and depressions.—5. In fort. A light wooden frame set up to guide workmen in throwing up a parapet.

Profile (prô-fil), v.t. [Fr. profiler.] To draw with a side view; to outline any object or objects so as to show a section as if cut perpendicularly from top to bottom: used adjectively. 'Two profile heads in medal of William and Mary.' H. Walpole.

Proflist (prô-fil-ist), n. One who takes profiles.

Profit (prô-fit), n. [Fr. profit, from L. proficetus, progress, increase, from proficio, to advance, to improve (whence proficient)—pro, before, and ficio, to make.] 1. Profit; advancement; improvement.

My brother Jacques he keeps at school, and report speaks goldenly of his profit. Shak.

2. Any advantage; any accession of good from labour or exertion: an extensive signification, comprehending the acquisition of anything valuable, corporeal or intellectual, temporal or spiritual. 'Now to heaven play with profit.' Tennyson.

Wisdom is good with an inheritance; and by it there is profit to them that see the sun.

Eccl. vii. 12.

3. The advantage or gain resulting to the owner of capital from its employment in any undertaking; the difference between the original cost and selling price of anything; acquisition beyond expenditure; pecuniary gain in any action or occupation; gain; emolument.—Net profit is the difference in favour of a seller between the selling price of commodities and the original cost after deducting all charges.—The rate of profit is the proportion which the amount of profit derived from an undertaking bears to the capital employed in it.

The dependence of the rate of profits on the cost of labour is here verified; for the labourer obtaining a diminished quantity of commodities, and no alteration being supposed in the circumstances of their production, the diminished quantity represents a diminished cost. J. S. Mill.

—Profit and loss, the gain or loss arising from goods bought or sold, or from any other contingency. In book-keeping both gains and losses are titled profit and loss, but the distinction is made by placing the former on the creditor side, and the latter on the debtor side. Profit and loss is also the name of a rule in arithmetic, which teaches how to calculate the gains or losses on mercantile transactions.—SW. Benefit, avail, service, improvement, advancement, gain, emolument.

Profit (prô-fit), v.t. [Fr. profiter. See the noun.] To benefit; to advance; to be of service to; to help on; to improve; to advance.

Brethren, if I come to you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you? 1 Cor. xiv. 6.

Continued arithmetical proportion is when the terms increase or decrease by equal differences. Thus, { 2. 4. 6. 8. 10. } by the difference 2, or generally, $a \pm d$, $a \pm 2d$, $a \pm 3d$, $a \pm 4d$, &c., where a denotes the first term, and d the common difference. Geometrical proportion or progression is when the terms increase or decrease in a certain constant ratio. Thus, $\{2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64\}$ by a continual multiplication or division by 2. Or, generally, $a, ar, ar^2, ar^3, ar^4, \&c.$

where a is the first term, and r the common ratio in the one case, and $1-r$ the common ratio in the other.—Harmonical progression, progression in harmonical proportion, or such that of any three consecutive terms the first is to the third as the difference between the first and second to the difference between the second and third, as for example, $\frac{1}{2}, \frac{1}{3}, \frac{1}{6}$, &c. See SERIES.—4. In music, (a) a regular succession of chords or movement of the parts in harmony. (b) The movement of one chord to another. (c) The same as Sequence.

Progressional (prô-gre'shon-al), n. A pertaining to progression, advance, or improvement. 'Progressional imperfections.' Sir T. Browne.

Progressionist (prô-gre'shon-ist), n. 1. One who maintains the doctrine that society is in a state of progress towards perfection, and that it will ultimately attain to it.—2. One who holds that the existing succession of animals and plants were not originally created, but were gradually developed from one simple form. H. Spencer.

Progressist (prô-gres-ist), n. One who holds to a belief in progress; a progressionist.

Progressive (prô-gres-iv), a. 1. Moving forward; proceeding onward; advancing; as, progressive motion or course.

Their wandering course, now high, now low, then hid.

Progressive, retrograde, or standing still. Milton.

2. Improving; as, the arts are in a progressive state.

Progressively (prô-gres-iv-ly), adv. In a progressive manner; by gradual or regular steps or advances.

Progressiveness (prô-gres-iv-ness), n. The state or quality of being progressive; an advancing; state of improvement; as, the progressiveness of science, arts, or taste.

There is nothing in the nature of art to exempt it from that character of progressiveness which belongs to science and philosophy, and in general to all spheres of intellectual activity. Dr. Caird.

Progressor (prô-gres-sér), n. 1. One who progresses or advances.—2. One who makes a progress.

Adrian, being a great progressor through all the Roman empire, whenever he found any decays of bridges or highways, or cuts of rivers and sewers, or like the, he gave substantial order for their repair. Bacon.

Proquet (prôg), v.i. To prog; to steal. Spelled also Prog.

And that man in the gown, in my opinion Looks like a proguing knave. Beau. & Fl.

Proheme, n. A proem; a preface; a prelude. Chaucer.

Prohibit (prô-hib-ít), v.t. [L. prohibeo, prohibitus—pro, before, and habeo, to have, to hold.] 1. To forbid authoritatively; to interdict by authority; as, to prohibit a person from doing a thing; to prohibit the thing being done.

Divine law, simply moral, commandeth or prohibits actions good or evil in respect of their inward nature and quality. Watts.

To this day, in France, the exportation of corn is almost always prohibited. Hume.

2. To hinder; to debar; to prevent; to preclude.

Gates of burning adamant, Barr'd over us, prohibit all egress. Milton.

—Forbid, Prohibit. See under FORBID.

Prohibitor (prô-hib-ít-ér), n. One who prohibits or forbids; a forbiddler; an interdicter.

Prohibition (prô-hi-bí'shon), n. [Fr., from L. prohibitio.] The act of prohibiting, forbidding, or interdicting; a declaration to hinder some action; interdict.

The law of God in the ten commandments consists mostly of prohibitions, 'thou shalt not do such a thing.' Tillotson.

—Writ of prohibition, in law, a writ issuing from a superior tribunal to prohibit or prevent an inferior court from proceeding to hear or dispose of a suit or matter, upon suggestion that the cognizance does not belong to that particular court. In Scotts law, the term prohibition is used for a technical clause in a deed of entail prohibiting the heir from selling the estate, contracting debt, altering the order of succession, &c.—SYN. Interdict, disallowance, inhibition.

Prohibitionist (prô-hi-bí'shon-ist), n. One who favours such heavy duties on certain goods as almost to amount to a prohibition of their importation or use; a protectionist.

Prohibitive, Prohibitory (prô-hib-ít-iv, prô-hib-ít-ô-ri), a. Serving to prohibit, forbid, or exclude; forbidding; implying prohibition; as, prohibitive duties on imports. 'Words prohibitory.' Ayliffe. 'Strict prohibitory laws.' Burke.

The precept . . . is in form negative and prohibitive. Barrow.

Pröin, v.t. [See PRUNE.] To lop; to trim; to prune.

The sprigs that did about it grow He pröined from the leafy arms. Chapman.

Pröin, v.i. To be employed in pruning. A good husbandman is ever pröining in his vineyard or his field. Bacon.

Pro indiviso (prô in-di-ví'sô), [L.] In law, a term applied to rights held by two or more persons equally, and otherwise termed indivisible rights; thus, the stock of a company is held pro indiviso by all the partners in trust.

Project (prô-jekt'), v.t. [L. projicio, projectum, to throw forth, to cast forward, to cause to jut out—pro, forward, and jacio, to throw.] 1. To throw out or forth; to cast or shoot forward.

The ascending villas on my side Project long shadows o'er the crystal tide. Pope.

2. To cast forward in the mind; to scheme; to contrive; to devise.

What sit we then projecting peace and war? Milton.

3. To exhibit or give a delineation of on a surface; to delineate. 'A plan of the naked lines of longitude and latitude projected on the meridian.' Watts. See PROJECTION. 4. Project (prô-jekt'), v.i. 1. To shoot forward; to extend beyond something else; to jut; to be prominent; as, a cornice or a promontory projects.—2. To form a scheme or project. Fuller.

Project (prô-jekt'), n. [O. Fr. project, Mod. Fr. projet. See above.] 1. That which is projected or devised; a plan; a scheme; a design; as, all our projects of happiness are liable to be frustrated.

He entered into the project with his customary ardour. Prusott.

2. An idle scheme; a design not practicable; as, a man given to projects.

Projectile (prô-jek-tíl), a. 1. Impelling forward; as, a projectile force.—2. Caused by impulse; impelled forward; as, projectile motion. Arbuthnot.

Projectile (prô-jek-tíl), n. A body projected, or impelled forward by force, particularly through the air. Thus, a stone thrown from the hand or a sling, an arrow shot from a bow, and a bullet discharged from a cannon, are projectiles.—Theory of projectiles, that branch of mechanics which treats of the motion of bodies thrown or driven by an impelling force from the surface of the earth, and affected by gravity and the resistance of the air.

Projection (prô-jek'shon), n. [L. projectio. See PROJECT, v.t.] 1. The act of projecting, throwing, or shooting forward.—2. The state of projecting or jutting out; a part projecting or jutting out, as of a building beyond the naked wall; a prominence.—3. The act of projecting or scheming; as, he undertook the projection of a new scheme.—4. The representation of something by means of lines, &c., drawn on a surface; especially the representation of any object on a perspective plane, or such a delineation as would result were the chief points of the object thrown forward upon the plane, each in the direction of a line drawn through it from a given point of sight or central point. This subject is of great importance in the making of maps, in which we have to consider the projection of the sphere. Projections of the sphere are of several kinds, according to the situations in which the eye is supposed to be placed in respect of the sphere and the plane on which it is to be projected. The most important are the stereographic, in which the eye is supposed to be placed on the surface of the sphere; the orthographic, in which the eye is supposed to be at an infinite distance; and the gnomonic, in which the eye is placed in the centre of the sphere.—Globular projection, that projection of the sphere which so represents its circles as to present the appearance of a globe.—

5. In alchemy, the casting of a certain powder, called powder of projection, into a crucible or other vessel full of some prepared metal or other matter, to be thereby transmuted into gold.

I will, however, give thee proof, and that shortly, which I will defy that peevish divine to confute, though he should strive with me as the Magicians strove with Moses before King Pharaoh. I will do projection in thy presence, my son,—in thy very presence,—and thine eyes shall witness the truth. Sir W. Scott.

Projectment (prô-jekt'ment), n. Design; contrivance. Ld. Clarendon. [Rare.]

Projector (prô-jekt'ér), n. 1. One who projects; one who forms a scheme or design.—2. One who forms wild or impracticable schemes.

Chymists and other projectors propose to themselves things utterly impracticable. Sir R. L'Estrange.

Promiscuous love by marriage was restrained. Shakespeare.

Promiscuously (prō-mis-ŏ-ŏs-ly) adv. In a promiscuous manner (a) in a crowd or mass without order with confused mixture, indiscriminately as, men of all classes promiscuously assembled, particles of different earths promiscuously united. (b) Without distinction of kind.

Like beans and birds promiscuously they join. Keats.

Promiscuousness (prō-mis-ŏ-ŏs-nēss) n. The state or quality of being promiscuous, or of being mixed without order or distinction.

Promise (prō-mis) n. (Fr. promettre, from L. promittere, from promisere, to send before or forward, pro, before, and minere, to send.) 1 A declaration written or verbal made by one person to another which binds the person who makes it to do or forbear a certain act specified, a declaration which given to the person to whom it is made a right to expect or to claim the performance or forbearance of some act especially, a declaration that something will be done or given for the benefit of another, as, to make a promise, to perform a promise.

And in these juggling hands so many believed, That palace walls as in a double bottom; That keep the word of promise to our ear, And break it to our hope. Shak.

2 In law, a declaration, verbal or written, made by one person to another for a good or valuable consideration, in the nature of a covenant, by which the promisee binds himself and, as the case may be, his legal representatives, to do or forbear some act, and gives to the promisee a legal right to demand and enforce a fulfillment. Promises and offer. In Shakspeare an offer is a proposal made by the offeror to the person to whom the offer is addressed, to give or to do something either gratuitously or on an onerous consideration. A promise is an offer, with this addition, that the promisee, from the nature of his proposal, thinks it unnecessary to wait for the other party's assent, which he takes it for granted will be given as soon as the offer is known. An offer is not bound till his offer is accepted. A promisee is bound as soon as the promise reaches the party to whom it is made. A promise may be absolute or conditional, lawful or unlawful, express or implied. An absolute promise must be fulfilled at all events. The obligation to fulfill a conditional promise depends on the performance of the condition. An unlawful promise is not binding, because it is void for it is incompatible with a prior paramount obligation of obedience to the laws. An express promise is one expressed in words or writing. An implied promise is one which reason and justice dictate. If I hire a man to perform a day's labor, without any declaration that I will pay him, the law presumes a promise on my part that I will give him a reasonable reward, and will enforce such implied promise. A promise without deed is said to be by parol, and the term is usually applied to engagement by parol only, a promise by deed being technically called a covenant. - 3 Ground or basis of expectation, earnest, pledge.

For never was I promised yet of such a speedy day. Shakespeare.

4 That which affords a ground or basis for hope or for expectation of future distinction, as, a youth of great promise. 'There stands the promise of colonial wealth.' Young.

My native country was full of youthful promise. Scott.

5 That which is promised; fulfillment or grant of what is promised.

And commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father. Act. i. 4.

Promiss (prō-mīss), n. [Fr. promesse, from L. promissum, from promittere, to send before or forward - pro, before, and mittere, to send.] 1. A declaration, written or verbal, made by one person to another which binds the person who makes it to do or forbear a certain act specified, a declaration which gives to the person to whom it is made a right to expect or to claim the performance or for breach of some act, especially a declaration that something will be done or given for the benefit of another, as, to make a promise, to perform a promise.

And he these juggling words no more believed,
That solemn words in a darkly room;
That from the need of promise to me came,
And lo! it is in our hands. Shak.

2. In law, a declaration, verbal or written, made by one person to another for a good or valuable consideration, in the nature of a covenant, by which the promisor binds himself and, as the case may be, his legal representatives, to do or forbear some act; and given to the promisee a legal right to demand and enforce a fulfillment.

Promiss and offer. In Latin law an offer is a proposal made by the offeror to the person to whom the offer is addressed, to give or to do something either gratuitously or on an onerous consideration. A promise is an offer with this addition, that the promisor, from the nature of his proposal, thinks it unnecessary to wait for the other party's assent, which he takes it for granted will be given as soon as the offer is known. An offer is not bound till his offer is accepted. A promise is bound as soon as the promise reaches the party to whom it is made. A promise may be absolute or conditional, legal or unlawful, express or implied. An absolute promise must be fulfilled at all events. An obligation to fulfil a conditional promise depends on the performance of the condition. An unlawful promise is not binding, because it is void, for it is incompatible with a prior paramount obligation of obedience to the law. An express promise is one expressed in words or writing. An implied promise is one which reason and justice dictate. If I hire a man to perform a day's labour, without any declaration that I will pay him, the law presumes a promise on my part that I will give him a reasonable reward, and will enforce such implied promise. A promise without deed is said to be by parol, and the term is usually applied to engagements by parol only, a promise by deed being technically called a covenant. - 3. Ground or basis of expectation, earnest, pledge.

For never saw I promise yet of such a bloody day. Shakespeare.

4. That which affords a ground or basis for hope or for expectation of future distinction, as, a youth of great promise. 'These buds the promise of celestial worth.' Young.

Forgetful how my rich promission makes
Thy glory fly along the Italian fields.
In lays that will outlast thy Deity. Tennyson.

Proof (prûf), n. [Fr. preuve. See PROVE.] 1. Any effort, process, or operation that ascertains truth or fact; a test; a trial; as, to make proof of a person's trustworthiness or of the truth of a statement. 'Only this proof I'll of thy valour make.' Shak.—2. What serves as evidence; what proves or establishes; a convincing token or argument; means of conviction; that amount of evidence which convinces the mind of the certainty of truth or fact, and produces belief.

Trifles light as air
Are to the jealous confirmations strong
As proofs of holy writ. Shak.

3. The thing proved or experienced; truth or knowledge gathered by experience; experience.

'Tis a common proof,
That lowliness is young ambition's ladder. Shak.

4. The state of having been tried and having stood the test; firmness or hardness that resists impression, or yields not to force; impenetrability of physical bodies: specifically applied to arms of defence; impenetrable armour. 'In strong proof of chastity well-arm'd.' Shak. 'Arms of proof.' Dryden.—5. A test applied to certain manufactured or other articles; the act of testing the strength of alcoholic spirits, so called from a mode formerly practised, called the gunpowder-proof. Spirit was poured over gunpowder and the vapour set fire to. If it fired the gunpowder it was over proof. If it damped the powder, so that the spirit burned without igniting the powder, it was under proof. Hence, also the degree of strength in spirit.—The proof spirit of commerce has been defined by act of parliament to be 'such as shall at the temperature of fifty-one degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer weigh twelve-thirteenths of an equal measure of distilled water.' See under ALCOHOL.—Proof of gunpowder, a test of strength, one ounce of powder being used with a 24-pound ball, which must be driven a distance of not less than 250 yards.—Proof of ordnance and small arms, tests by means of hydraulic pressure and firing heavy charges.—6. In printing, a rough impression of a sheet, taken for correction. A first proof is the impression taken with all the errors of workmanship. After this is corrected, another impression is printed with more care, to send to the author: this is termed a clean proof. When this is corrected by the author, and the types altered accordingly, another proof is taken and carefully read over: this is called the press proof.—7. In engr. an impression taken from an engraving to prove the state of it during the progress of executing it; also, an early impression, or one of a limited number, taken before the letters to be inserted are engraved on the plate. It is called a proof-impression or proof-print, and is considered the best, because taken before the plate is worn.

Proof (prûf), a. Impenetrable; able to resist, physically or morally; as, water-proof, fire-proof, proof against shot.
Now put your shields before your hearts and fight
With hearts more proof than shields. Shak.
It is often followed by to or against before the thing resisted. 'Proof against all temptation.' Milton.

He past expression lived,
Proof to disdain. Dryden.

[In its adjectival use proof is elliptical for proof.]

Proof-arm (prûf-arm), v. t. To arm as with proof; to arm so as to make secure.

A delicate, and knows it,
And out of that proof turns herself. Beau. & Fl.

Proof-house (prûf'hous), n. A house fitted up for proving the barrels of fire-arms.

Proofless (prûfless), a. Wanting sufficient evidence to induce belief; not proved. Boyle.

Prooflessly (prûf'less-ly), adv. Without proof. 'Prooflessly asserted.' Boyle.

Proof-plane (prûf'plan), n. In elect. a small, thin metallic disc, insulated on a non-conducting handle, by which electricity may be carried from one place to another. It is used in experiments on the distribution of electricity on conductors. When it is laid against the surface whose electric density it is intended to measure, it forms, as it were, a part of the surface, and takes the charge due to the area which it covers, which charge may be carried to an electrometer and tested.

Proof-print (prûf'print), n. See PROOF, n. 7.

Proof-sheet (prûf'shêt), n. In printing, a rough impression of a sheet. See PROOF, n. 6.

Propædæutics (prô-pê-dû-tiks), n. [Gr. propædeus, to instruct beforehand, from pro, before, and paideus, to instruct, to educate, from paîs, paîdos, a child.] The preliminary learning connected with any art or science; the body of knowledge and of rules necessary for the study of some particular art, science, &c.

Propagable (prop'a-ga-bl), a. [See PROPAGATE.] 1. Capable of being propagated or of being continued or multiplied by natural generation or production.

Such creatures as are produced each by its peculiar seed constitute a distinct propagable sort of creatures. Boyle.

2. Capable of being spread or extended by any means, as tenets, doctrines, or principles.

Propaganda (prop-a-gan'da), n. [L. See PROPAGATE.] 1. A name generally given to those institutions by means of which Christianity is propagated in heathen countries, more particularly to an association, the congregation de propaganda fide (for propagating the faith), established at Rome by Gregory XV. in 1623 for diffusing a knowledge of Roman Catholicism throughout the world, now charged with the management of the Roman Catholic missions. Hence.—2. Any kind of institution or system for proselytizing or for propagating a peculiar set of doctrines.

(In France) on the one hand there is the clerico-monarchical tradition, which seeks order by the suppression of individual reason and national liberties; on the other hand there is an anarchist propaganda, which promises prosperity and unbounded pleasure through the suppression of churches and governments. Contemp. Rev.

The rules of the association [the National Secular Society] inform us that it is the duty of an 'active member' to promote the circulation of secular literature and generally to aid the Free-thought propaganda of his neighbourhood. Sat. Rev.

Propagandism (prop-a-gand'izm), a. [From propaganda.] The system or practice of propagating tenets or principles.

The governor-general rejoins that religious propagandism would most certainly rouse the resentment of the natives, and produce an explosion of religious passions which would end in a religious war. Times newspaper.

Propagandist (prop-a-gand'ist), n. [From propaganda.] One who devotes himself to the spread of any system of principles.

Bonaparte selected a body to compose his Sanhedrin of political propagandists. R. Walsh.

Proplastic (prô-plast'ik), a. [See PROPLASM.] Forming a mould or cast.

Proplastics (prô-plas'tiks), n. [See above.] The art of making moulds for castings, &c.

Propodium (prô-pô'di-um), n. [Gr. pro, before, and pous, podos, a foot.] In zool. the anterior part of the foot in mollusca.

In the Heteropoda, however, and in the wing-shells (Strombidae), the foot exhibits a division into three portions—an anterior, the 'propodium,' a middle, the 'mesopodium,' and a posterior lobe, or 'metapodium.' H. A. Nicholas.

Propolis (prô-po-lis), n. [Gr. pro, before, and polis, city.] A red, resinous, odorous substance having some resemblance to wax and smelling like storax, collected from the viscid buds of various trees; used by bees to stop the holes and crevices in their hives to prevent the entrance of cold air, to strengthen the cells, &c.

Propone (prô-pôn'), v.t. [L. propono, to propose—pro, before, and pono, to place.] 1. To propose; to propound. 'Doctrine . . . proposed and thrust into their hearts with words sweeter than honey.' Bp. Coverdale.

2. In Scots law, to state; to bring forward.—Pleas proposed and repelled, in Scots law, those pleas which have been stated in a court, and repelled previous to decree being given.

Proponent (prô-pô-nent), n. [L. proponens—pro, before, and pono, to place.] One that makes a proposal, or lays down a proposition.

For mysterious things of faith rely On the proponent, heaven's authority. Dryden.

Proponent (prô-pô-nent), a. Making proposals; proposing.

Proportion (prô-pôr-shon), n. [L. proportio—pro, before, and portio, part or share. See PORTION.] 1. The comparative relation of one thing to another in respect to size, quantity, or degree; equal or corresponding degree.

He must be little skilled in the world who thinks that men's talking much or little shall hold proportions only to their knowledge. Locke.

Several nations are recovered out of their ignorance in proportion as they converse more or less with those of the reformed churches. Addison.

2. The relation of one part to another or to the whole, with respect to magnitude; the relative size and arrangement of parts; as, the proportion of the parts of an edifice, or of the human body.

The proportions are so well arranged that nothing appears to an advantage. Addison.

Formed in the best proportions of her sex, Rowena was tall in stature, yet not so much so as to attract observation on account of superior height. Sir W. Scott.

3. Symmetrical arrangement, distribution, or adjustment; the proper relation of parts in a whole; symmetry; as, the limbs are out of proportion to the body.

No man of the present age is equal in the strength, proportion, and knitting of his limbs to the Hercules of Farnese. Dryden.

4. That which falls to one's lot when a whole is divided according to a rule or principle; just or equal share; lot.

Let the women . . . do the same things in their proportions and capacities. Jer. Taylor.

5.† Form; shape; figure. Shak.—6. In math. the equality or similarity of ratios, ratio being the relation which one quantity bears to another of the same kind in respect of magnitude; or proportion is a relation among quantities such that the quotient of the first divided by the second is equal to the quotient of the third divided by the fourth. Thus 5 is to 10 as 8 is to 16; that is, 5 bears the same relation to 10 as 8 does to 16. Proportion is expressed by $a : b :: c : d$, or $a : b = c : d$, or $\frac{a}{b} = \frac{c}{d}$.—The above is sometimes called geometrical proportion. In contradistinction to arithmetical proportion, or that in which the difference of the first and second is equal to the difference of the third and fourth. See also PROGRESSION.—7. In arith. the rule of three, that rule which according to the theory of proportion enables us to find a fourth proportional to three given numbers, that is, a number to which the third bears the same ratio as the first does to the second.—Simple proportion, the equality of the ratio of two quantities to that of two other quantities.—Compound proportion, the equality of the ratio of two quantities to another ratio, the antecedent and consequent of which are respectively the products of the antecedents and consequents of two or more ratios.—Continued proportion, a succession of several equal ratios, as 2, 4, 8, 16, &c.—Harmonical or musical proportion, a relation of three or four quantities such that the first is to the last as the difference between the two first is to the difference between the two last; thus 2, 3, 6 are in harmonical proportion, for 2 is to 6 as 1 is to 3.—Reciprocal or inverse proportion, an equality between a direct and a reciprocal ratio, or a proportion in which the first term is to the second as the fourth is to the third, as 4 : 2 :: 8 : 6 inversely, that is as $\frac{1}{2} : \frac{1}{4} :: \frac{1}{6} : \frac{1}{8}$.

Proportion (prô-pôr-shon), v.t. 1. To adjust in a suitable proportion; to harmoniously adjust to something else as regards dimensions or extent; as, to proportion the size of a building to its height, or the thickness of a thing to its length; to proportion our expenditures to our income.

In the loss of an object, we do not proportion our grief to its real value, but to the value our fancies set upon it. Addison.

2. To form with symmetry; to give a symmetrical form to.

Nature had proportioned her without any fault, quickly to be discovered by the senses. Sir P. Sidney.

3. To bear proportion or adequate relation to; to equal.

Bid him, therefore, consider of his ransom; which must proportion the losses we have borne. Shak.

Proportionable (prô-pôr-shon-a-bl), a. 1. Capable of being proportioned or made proportional.—2. Being in proportion; having a due comparative relation; proportional; corresponding. 'To levy power proportionable to the enemy.' Shak.

Such eloquence may exist without a proportionable degree of wisdom. Burke.

3. Well proportioned; symmetrical. Lady M. W. Montagu.

Proportionableness (prô-pôr'shon-a-bi-nes), n. State of being proportionable.

The ground of all pleasure is agreement and proportionableness of the temper and constitution of anything. Hammond.

The act of falling down, or the act of bowing in humility or adoration; primarily, the act of falling on the face, but it is now used for kneeling or bowing in reverence and worship.—3. Great depression; dejection; as, a prostration of spirits.—4. In med. a latent, not an exhausted state of the vital energies; great oppression of natural strength and vigour; that state of the body in disease in which the system is oppressed. Prostration is different and distinct from exhaustion, and is analogous to the state of a spring lying under such a weight that it is incapable of action, while exhaustion is analogous to the state of a spring deprived of its elastic powers.

A sudden prostration of strength or weakness attends this colick. Arbuthnot.

Prostyle (pro-still), n. and a. [Gr. prostylos—pro, and stylos, a column.] In arch.

applied to a portico in which the columns stand out quite free from the wall of the building to which it is attached; also applied to a temple or other structure having pillars in front only. See AMPHIPROSTYLE and PORTICO.

Prosy (pró-d), a. Like prose; prosaic; hence, dull; tedious; boring.

It was one fatal Monday—a dull question of finance and figures. Prasy and few were the speakers. Lord Lytton.

Prosylogium (pró-sil'ó-jizm), n. [Prefix pro, before, and sylogium.] In logic, see EPICUREMA.

Protaetick (pró-tak'tik), a. [Gr. protaktikos, placing or placed before—pro, before, and taetis, to arrange.] Being placed at the beginning; previous.

Protagon (pró'ta-gon), n. [Gr. protos, first, and agon, leading, acting.] A phosphuretted fatty compound which forms a chief constituent of nervous tissue. Its composition is $C_{18}H_{30}N_2O_2$.

Now it has recently been discovered that white or fibrous nerve-tissue is chemically distinguished from gray or vesicular nerve-tissue by the presence in large quantity of a substance called protagon. H. Spencer.

Protagonist (pró'tag'ó-nist), n. [Gr. protagonistēs—protos, first, and agonistēs, an actor.] In the Greek drama, the leading character or actor in a play; hence, a leading character generally.

It is charged upon me that I make debauched persons (such as they say my astrologer and gambler are) my protagonists, or the chief persons of the drama. Dryden.

Protamoeba (pró-ta-mé'ba), n. [Gr. protos, first, and amaba.] A name given by Hæckel to these minute humps of protoplasm found in fresh waters, and forming animal bodies of an extremely low grade, continually changing their form, and multiplying by spontaneous division.

Profoundry (prō-fan-dri), n. [Or prothos, first, and andros, a man, a male.] In fact, the development of the elements below the pituita.

The terms profoundry and proteogony used by H. de la Harpe to express, in the one case the development of the manna before the growth, in the other case the development of the plants before the manna, are in constant and comparative that they have been adopted in this paper.

Pro tanto (prō-tan-to), [L.] For as much. Proterus (prō-tēr-us), n. [Or proterus, from proterein, to precede, to be before—pro, before, forward, and terein, to stretch.] A proposition, a maxim. J. Johnson. (Rare.) 1. In Greek, and what the first clause of a conditional sentence, being the condition on which the main term (apodosis) depends, or notwithstanding which it takes place, as, If we run (proterus) we shall be in time (apodosis), although he was incompetent (proterus) he was elected (apodosis). See PROTERUS. 2. In the one drama the first part of a play. In which the several persons are shown, their characters intimated, and the subject proposed and entered on, as opposed to epitete.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), n. [Or proterus, first, and andros, a star.] A genus of star-fishes belonging to Ophiurida. Known only by fossil remains found in Silurian rocks.

There are indeed some proterus persons in the antients, whom they call in their plays. Dryden.

Protea (prō-tē-a), n. (From Protea, a self-transforming one—god in allusion to the diversity of appearance of the species.) A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Proteaceae, of which it is the type. The species are chiefly natives of the Cape of Good Hope, and consist of a variety of beautiful and graceful shrubs, with very variable foliage and large heads of flowers, 3 or 5 inches in diameter.

Proteaceae (prō-tē-ā-sē), a. pl. A nat. order of apetalous arborescent exogens, chiefly natives of Australia and the Cape of Good Hope. They are shrubs or small trees, with hard dry epidermis or alternate leaves, and often large heads of showy and richly-colored flowers.

Proteaceous (prō-tē-ā-sē), a. Of or pertaining to the Proteaceae.

Protean (prō-tē-an), a. Pertaining to Proteus, the divinity who could change his shape, readily assuming different shapes, immediately variable. Protean transformations. Cadworth. See PROTEUS.

Proteanly (prō-tē-an-lē), adv. In a protean manner, with the assumption of different shapes. Proteanly transformed into different shapes. Cadworth.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), n. [L. proterus, from proterein, to protect—pro, before, and terein, to cover from root tem seen in temere, to think.] 1. To cover or shield from danger or injury, to defend, to guard, to preserve in safety. A word of general import both in a literal and figurative sense. Walls protect a city or garrison; clothing is designed to protect the body from cold, arms may protect one from assault; our houses protect us from the inclemencies of the weather, the law protects our persons and property, the father protects his children, and the guardian his ward, a shade protects us from extreme heat, &c.

The gods of Comus protect you. Shak.

2. To act as regent or protector for. Shak. 3. To defend, defend, guard, preserve, save, secure, harbour, shelter, patronize, countenance, foster.

Proteotically (prō-tē-ō-ti-kē-lē), adv. In a protecting manner, by protecting.

Protection (prō-tē-ō-shun), n. 1. The act of protecting, or the state of being protected; defence, shelter from evil preservation from loss, injury, or annoyance, as, to find protection under good laws and an upright administration, divine protection.

To your protection I committed our goods. Shak.

Protector (prō-tē-ō-ter), n. [Fr. protector.] 1. One who or that which protects, defends, or shields from injury, evil, or oppression, a defender, a guardian. 'Under the covering of a careful night, who seemed my good protector.' Shak. 'Called him dear protector in her fright.' Templeton. 2. In Eng. hist. one who had the care of the kingdom during the king's minority; a regent, a non-regal head of the executive, intrusted in an exceptional manner with the supreme power; a title specifically applied to Oliver Cromwell, who assumed the title of Lord Protector in 1653.

In a concluded he shall be protector. Shak. What's a protector? he's a merry thing. That says it is the name of a king. Chastellain.

3. A cardinal who looks after the interests, as Rome, of a Roman Catholic nation or religious order. Protector of the settlement, in law, the person appointed by the Trusts and Recoveries Act, in substitution of the old tenant to the premises whose concurrence in haring was then-till in remainder is required in order to preserve, under certain modifications, the control of the tenant for life over the remainder man.

Protectoral (prō-tē-ō-ter-al), a. Relating to a protector, protectorial. Salas. Rev.

Protectorate (prō-tē-ō-ter-āt), n. 1. Government by a protector specifically applied to the period in English history during which Cromwell was protector. 2. A relation sometimes adopted by a strong country towards a weak one, whereby the former protects the latter from hostile invasion, and interferes more or less in its domestic concerns.

Protectorial (prō-tē-ō-ter-ē-ē), a. Relating to a protector, protectorial.

Protectoriism (prō-tē-ō-ter-ē-ē-izm), a. Having no protector.

Protectorship (prō-tē-ō-ter-ship), n. The office of a protector or regent, a protectorate.

Protectorism (prō-tē-ō-ter-izm), n. A female who protects. Shak.

Protectorix (prō-tē-ō-ter-ix), n. Same as Protectorism.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), n. [Fr., one protected.] One under the care and protection of another, as, he is a proterus of mine.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), n. [Fr.] A female who is protected.

Protein (prō-tē-in), n. [See PROTEIN.] A name given to substances analogous in composition to protein, that is, consisting of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, sometimes united with sulphur and phosphorus. The gluten of flour, albumen, the fibrin of the blood, crystalline, which is the chief constituent of muscle and flesh, and casein are examples of proteins. Gelatin and chondrin Huxley calls outlying members of the same group. Proteins are the essential food stuffs.

Proteins have been divided into hard proteins and soft proteins—the amyloids and the caseins, which form the protein of the protein. This is a very interesting (and somewhat mysterious) fact, as the one kind that the condition of the protein does not develop hard, and, on the other, that the amyloids and caseins, as they contain protein only the production of heat. Proteins are protein because as no time can be produced without them, but they are also protein, not only directly but indirectly, as we have seen, they are compared to give rise to amyloids by chemical metamorphosis within the body. Huxley.

Protein (prō-tē-in), a. pl. A family of bryozoans of the order Protein, characterized by a compressed tail, as in the Protein, and large branches. The four limbs are developed. The axolell and Protein are examples. See AXOLELL, PROTEIN.

Protein (prō-tē-in), a. pl. [From Protein, first, because protein occupies the first place in relation to the albuminous principle.] The essential principle of food, obtained from animal or vegetable albumen, fibrin, or casein, which are all considered to be modifications of it. It forms a yellowish brittle mass, insoluble in water and alcohol, and is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen. Its substance, however, as a distinct proteic principle is doubtful. Often used adjectively, or as the first element in a compound. 'The hypothetical protein-protein.' H. Spencer.

Proteinaceous (prō-tē-in-ā-sē), a. Pertaining to protein, containing or consisting of protein.

Of all widely distributed vegetable substances, only a proteinaceous substance can be mentioned. Shak.

Protein (prō-tē-in), n. A genus of animals consisting of a single species, the Protein (earth-worm) of the Cape of Good Hope (Protein Lalandi), by some naturalists called to the rank of a distinct family. It forms the connecting link between the human and civet, reuniting the former in its general contour and manners, though of inferior size and strength, and having more of the lengthened head and pointed muzzle of the latter. It burrows like a fox, and ventures abroad only at night in search of its food, which consists chiefly of carrion and the smaller kinds of vermin.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), [L.] For the time being temporary, as, a proterus supply or provision.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), [L.] For the time being temporary, as, a proterus supply or provision.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), [L.] For the time being temporary, as, a proterus supply or provision.

Proterus (prō-tēr-us), [L.] For the time being temporary, as, a proterus supply or provision.

One part of it, however small, cannot, without a contradiction, be brought on one divisible into parts. See H. Huxley.

Proterandrous (pro-tér-an'drus), a. [Gr. proterus, before, and andrus, a man, a male.] A term in botany. See EXTRACT.

Certain individuals mature their pollen before the female flowers on the same plant are ready for fertilization, and are called proterandrous, while conversely other individuals, called protogynous, have their stigmas mature before their pollen is ready.

Proteranthous (pro-tér-an'thus), a. [Gr. proterus, before, and anthos, a flower.] In bot. (a) applied to plants whose leaves appear before their flowers. Lindley (b) Applied to plants whose flowers appear before their leaves. As Gray (c) Applied to flowers the anthers of which are matured before the stigma. Darwin.

Protogynous (pro-tér-ó-j'na), a. A term in botany. See EXTRACT under PROTERANDROUS.

Proteromurus (pro-tér-ó-m'rus), a. [Gr. proterus, earlier, and murus, a lizard.] Name of a Proteosaurus.

Proterovitis (pro-tér-ó-v'is), a. [L. proterovitis, putrescence, from proterus—pro, intense, and tervus, crabbed.] Putrescence; putrescence. Buller.

Protest (pro-test'), v. t. [L. protestor—pro, before, and testor, to affirm, from testis, a witness. See TEST.] 1. To affirm with solemnity; to make a solemn declaration of a fact or opinion; to avow, as, I protest to you, I have no knowledge of this transaction.

The lady protests too much, methinks. Shak.
2. To make a solemn or formal declaration (often in writing) expressive of opposition, with against.

The conscience has power to disapprove and to protest against the ascription of the passion. South.

He protests against your virtue, and swears he'll not be try'd by any but his peers. Shak.

Protest (pro-test'), v. t. 1. To make a solemn declaration or affirmation of; to assert; to avow, as, to protest one's innocence, often followed by a clause as object.

To think upon her woe I do protest.
That I have wept a hundred several times. Shak.
2. To call as a witness in affirming or denying, or to prove an affirmation, to appeal to. [Rare.]

Please thy opponent
My journey strange, with clamorous uproar Protesting innocence. Shak.

3. To show; to give evidence of; to declare; to publish.

I will make it good how you dare, with what you dare, and when you dare.—Do me right or I will protest your cowardice. Shak.

4. To promise solemnly; to vow.

On Diana's altar to protest
For eyes another and single life. Shak.

—To protest a bill of exchange, in com. to mark or vote it, through a notary public, for non-payment or non-acceptance. See the noun, 2.

Protest (pro-test'), a. 1. A solemn declaration of opinion, commonly against some act, a formal and solemn declaration (usually in writing) by which a person declares that he does either not at all, or only conditionally, yield his consent to any act to which he might otherwise be deemed to have yielded an unconditional assent. 2. In parliament, the dissent of a peer to a vote of the House of Peers, entered on the journals of the house, with his reasons for such dissent. See E. May. 3. In law (a) a formal declaration by the holder of a bill of exchange or promissory note, or by a notary public at his request, that acceptance or payment has been refused, and that the holder intends to recover all the expenses to which he may be put in consequence thereof. (b) A writing attested by a justice of the peace or consul, drawn up by the master of a ship, stating the circumstances under which any injury has happened to the ship or cargo, or other circumstances calculated to affect the liability of the owners, officers, crew, &c.

Protestancy (pro-tés-an-si), a. PROTESTANT.

So that in truth these exceptions, if they were true, would not strike at protestancy, but at the Christian religion. Alph. Tisdale.

Protestando (pro-tés-tan'do), a. [L.] In law, a protestation. See PROTESTATION, & PROTESTANT (pro-tés-tant), a. 1. PROTESTING; making a protest.—2. Of or pertaining to Protestants, or their doctrines or forms of religion.

Since the spreading of the protestant religion, several nations are removed out of their ignorance. Addison.

Protestant (pro-tés-tant), a. One who protests; a name given to one of the party who adhered to Luther at the Reformation in 1518, and protested, or made a solemn declaration of dissent from a decree of the emperor Charles V and the diet of Spire, and appealed to a general council. The name is now applied generally to those Christian denominations that differ from the Church of Rome, and that sprang from the Reformation.

Protestantism (pro-tés-tant-izm), a. PROTESTANT. 'The Protestant Church of England.' Becon.

Protestantism (pro-tés-tant-izm), a. The state of being a protestant; the principle or the religion of Protestants. 'The liberal genius of protestantism.' T. Warton.

Protestantism (pro-tés-tant-izm), v. t. To render Protestant, to convert to Protestantism. 'To protestantize Ireland.' Disraeli.

Protestantly (pro-tés-tant-li), adv. In conformity to Protestantism or the Protestants. Hilton.

Protestation (pro-tés-tá-shon), a. [Fr. protestation, L. protestatio. See PROTEST.] 1. A solemn declaration of a fact, opinion, or resolution, an avowal, as, protestations of friendship or of amendment.—2. A solemn declaration of dissent, a protest, as, the protestation of certain noblemen against an order of council.—3. In law, a declaration in pleading, by which the party interposed an oblique allegation or denial of some fact, by protesting that it did or did not exist, and at the same time avoiding a direct affirmation or denial. Protestations are now abolished. In Suits law, a proceeding taken by a defendant, where the pursuer neglects to proceed, to compel him either to proceed or to suffer the action to fall.

Protestor (pro-tés-tor), a. One who

1. One who promises declaration, of exchange, &c.
2. adv. By way

guishing characteristic was the faculty of assuming different shapes, hence, one who easily changes his form or principles.—2. In zool. the name given to a genus of perennibranchiate tetrachelians. One species only has been hitherto discovered, namely, the Protos or Hypothet argenteus, a nautilus which is found in subterranean lakes and caves in Illyria and Dalmatia. It attains a length of about 1 foot. The body is smooth, naked, and eel-like, the legs four in number, small and weak, the foremost three-toed, the hinder four-toed, and, in addition to permanent external gills, it possesses lungs in the form of slender tubes. From its habitat the power of vision is unnecessary, and in point of fact its eyes are rudimentary and covered by the skin.—3. A genus of Protos, remarkable for changeableness of form. The species in which this peculiarity is best exemplified is known as the Protos diffusus. This genus is now more commonly called Amoeba (which see).

Prothalamium, Prothalamion (pro-thá-lá-m'um, pro-thá-lá-m'ion), a. [Gr. pro, for, and thalamos, marriage-bed.] A piece written to celebrate a marriage, an epithalamium. 'When prothalamiums praise that happy day.' Dryden.

Prothallus, Prothallium (pro-thál'us, pro-thál'li-um), a. [Prefix pro, before, and thallus.] The first result of the germination of the spore in the higher cryptogams, as ferns, horsetails, &c.

If one of these spores be liberated from the sporocarp, and placed under favorable conditions, it germinates, giving off roots on the one hand, and producing on the other hand a little cellular expansion or bud, which is termed the prothallus. This prothallus however is not itself developed into a new fern, but it is a more temporary or provisional body, upon which are produced male and female organs of reproduction. The male organs are produced upon the under side of the prothallus, and they have the form of minute cellular umbellones, containing reproductive cells. These cells are liberated, when they burst, and give out to true spermatozoa in the form of colored spiral filaments. The female organs are also placed upon the under surface of the prothallus, and also have the form of cellular umbellones. The cells of these umbellones are so arranged that they form a canal, leading down to a large central cell or ovule. H. A. Nicholson.

Prothans (pró-thans), a. [Gr. prothans, from prothēnō, to put before—pro, forth, forwards, and thēnō, to place.] 1. The places in a church on which the elements for the eucharist are put previous to their being placed on the altar, called also Crucifers. 2. In very prothans (which see).

Prothomontari (pró-thon-ó-m'ri-at), a. The college constituted by the twelve apostolical prothomontaries in Rome. Spelled also Prothomontari.

Prothonotary (pró-thon-ó-tá-ri), a. [L. L. prothomontarius—Gr. prothos, first, and L. notarius, a scribe. See NOTARY. The insertion of A in this word is a mistake.] A chief notary or clerk. 'My private prothonotary.' Harriet. Specifically, (a) in the American Church, originally one of seven officers charged with registering the acts of the church, lives of the martyrs, &c. now one of twelve, constituting a college, who receive the last wills of cardinals, make informations and proceedings necessary for the canonization of saints, &c. they are called apostolical prothomontaries. (b) in the Eastern Church, the chief secretary of the patriarch of Constantinople, who superintended the secular work of the province. (c) in law, a chief clerk in the Court of Common Pleas and in the King's Bench, there were formerly three such officers in the former court, and one in the latter. These offices are now abolished. (d) in the United States, a chief clerk of court in some particular states. Spelled also Prothomontary.

Protista (pró-tis'ta), a. pl. [Gr. protistos, the very first, from protos, first.] A term designed to express those organisms—protophytes and protozoans—which lie on the debatable land between vegetables and animals, and which in some instances can be only doubtfully referred to either.

According to Professor Haeckel, the material universe, so far as we at present know it, resolves itself into minerals, plants, and animals. I may say at starting that, along with most of my brother naturalists in Britain, I regard the introduction of this new kingdom, the Protista, as a mistake, but as the proposal even involves most interesting questions as to relations between the three recognized kingdoms, it is well worthy of careful consideration. See E. Haeckel.

Protococcus (pró-tó-kok'us), a. [Gr. protos, first, and koccus, a berry.] A genus of algae of the nat. order Fucales. F. pinnalis (red-snow) appears on the surface of snow, hanging on twigs or rocks in the Arctic regions or amongst the Alps, in an incredibly short space of time, with a deep crimson. This plant, which may be regarded as one of the simplest forms of vegetation, consists of a little bag or sacculus forming a cell. A large number of these are commonly found together, but each one is separate from the rest, and is to be regarded as a distinct individual. This is the still condition of the Protract (prô-trakt'), v.t. [L. protractus, from protraho—pro, forward, and traho, to draw (whence trace, traction, extract, etc.).] 1. To draw out or lengthen in time; to continue; to prolong; as, to protract an argument; to protract a discussion; to protract a war or a negotiation; very common in past participle; as, a protracted sitting of an assembly; the discussion was very protracted.

Doubtless he shrives this woman to her smock,
Else ne'er could he so long protract his speech.
Shak.

2. To lengthen out in space.

Many a ramble, far
And wide protracted, through the tamer ground
Of these our unimaginative days.
Wordsworth.

3. To delay; to defer; to put off to a distant time; as, to protract the decision of a question; to protract the final issue.—4. In surv. to draw to a scale; to lay down by means of a scale and protractor the lines and angles of a piece of land; to plot.

Protract (prô-trakt'), n. Tedious continuance.

Protractedly (prô-trak'ted-ly), adv. In a prolonged or protracted manner; tediously.

Protractor (prô-trakt'ôr), n. One who protracts or lengthens in time.

Protraction (prô-trak'shon), n. 1. The act of drawing out or continuing in time; the act of delaying the termination of a thing; as, the protraction of a debate.—2. In surv. (a) the act of plotting or laying down on paper the dimensions of a field, &c. (b) That which is protracted or plotted on paper.

Protractive (prô-trak'tiv), a. Drawing out or lengthening in time; prolonging; continuing; delaying.

He suffered their protractive arts.
Dryden.

Protractor (prô-trakt'ôr), n. One who or that which protracts; specifically, (a) in surv. an instrument for laying down and measuring angles on paper. It is of various forms, semicircular, rectangular, or circular. (b) In anat. a muscle which draws forward a part. (c) In surv. an instrument resembling a forceps for drawing extraneous bodies out of a wound.

Protreptical (prô-trep'tik-al), a. [Gr. protreptikos, fitted for urging on, hortatory, from protrepo, to urge on—pro, forward, and trepô, to turn.] Intended or adapted to persuade; persuasive; hortatory. 'The means used are partly didactical and protreptical.' Bp. Ward.

Protrude (prô-trôd'), v.t. pret. & pp. protruded; ppr. protruding. [L. protrudo—pro, forth, forwards, and trudo, to thrust (whence obtrude, intrude).] 1. To thrust forward; to drive or force along. 'The sea's being protruded forwards . . . by the mud or earth discharged into it by rivers.' Woodward.—2. To shoot forth or project, or cause to project; as, a small protrudes its horns.—3. To thrust out as from confinement; to cause to come forth. 'Spring protrudes the bursting gems.' Thomson.

The parts protrude beyond the skin.
Bacon.

Protrusile (prô-trô's'il), a. Capable of being protruded and withdrawn.

Protrusion (prô-trô'zhon), n. 1. The act of protruding or thrusting forward or beyond the usual limit; a thrusting or driving; a push. 'Without either resistance or protrusion.' Locke.—2. The state of being protruded.

Protrusive (prô-trô'ziv), a. Thrusting or impelling forward; as, protrusive motion.

Protrusively (prô-trô'ziv-ly), adv. In a protrusive manner; obtrusively.

To him thou, with sniffing charity, wilt protrusively proffer thy hand-lamp.
Carlyle.

Protuberance (prô-tû'bér-ans), n. [Fr. protubérance. See PROTUBERATE.] A swelling or tumour on the body; a prominence; a bunch or knob; anything swelled or pushed beyond the surrounding or adjacent surface; on the surface of the earth, a hill, knoll, or other elevation. Protuberance differs from projection in being applied to parts that rise from the surface with a gradual ascent or small angle, whereas a projection may be at a right angle with the surface. 'Mountains that seemed but so many wens and unnatural protuberances upon the face of the earth.' Dr. H. More.

Protuberancy (prô-tû'bér-an-si), n. Same as Protuberance.

Protuberant (prô-tû'bér-ant), a. Swelling; prominent beyond the surrounding surface; as, a protuberant joint; a protuberant eye.

Though the eye seems round, in reality the iris is protuberant above the white.
Ray.

Protuberantly (prô-tû'bér-ant-ly), adv. In a protuberant manner; in the way of protuberance.

Protuberate (prô-tû'bér-ât), v.t. pret. protuberated; ppr. protuberating. [L. L. protubero, protuberatus—pro, before and tubero, to bulge, from L. tubero, a hump, a bump, a swelling, akin to tumescere, to swell. See TUMID.] To swell or be prominent beyond the adjacent surface; to bulge out.

If the navel protuberates, make a small puncture with a lancet through the skin.
Sharpe.

Protuberation (prô-tû'bér-â'shon), n. The act of swelling beyond the surrounding surface.

Protuberous (prô-tû'bér-us), a. Protuberant.

Proud (prôud), a. [A. Sax. prôd, proud, whence prîst, pride; cog. Dan. prôd, stately, magnificent.] 1. Feeling, manifesting, or possessing pride, in a good or bad sense; (a) possessing a high or unreasonable opinion of one's own excellence; filled with or showing inordinate self-esteem; claiming undue deference or consideration; haughty; arrogant; supercilious; presumptuous. And was so proud, that should he meet
The twelve apostles in the street,
He'd turn his nose up at them all.
And shew his Saviour from the wall.
Churchill.
The proudest admirer of his own parts might find it useful to consult with others, though of inferior capacity.
Watts.

(b) Ready to boast; elated; priding one's self; as, proud of one's country.—2. Proceeding from pride; daring; presumptuous. Easily the proud attempt
Of spirits apostate, and their counsels vain
Thou hast repelled.
Milton.

3. Lofly of mien; of fearless or untamable character; full of life, vigour, or mettle. 'The proudest panther in the chase.' Shak. 'The blunt bear, rough boar, or lion proud.' Shak.
The fiend replied not, overcome with rage;
But like a proud steed reined, went haughtily on.
Milton.

4. Giving reason or occasion for pride, self-gratulation, or boasting; suggesting or exciting pride; exhibiting grandeur; ostentatious; grand; lofty; magnificent; splendid. 'Proud temples.' Dryden. 'Proud titles.' Shak.—5. Excited by the animal appetite; applied particularly to the female of certain animals. 'A breeding jennet, lusty, young and proud.' Shak.—Proud flesh, a fungous growth or fleshy excrescence arising in wounds and ulcers.

Proud-hearted (prôud'hârt-ed), a. Haughty; arrogant; proud. 'Proud-hearted Warwick.' Shak.

Proudish (prôud'ish), a. Somewhat proud.

Proudly (prôud'ly), adv. In a proud manner; with inordinate self-esteem; haughtily; ostentatiously; with lofty airs or mien; with mettle, life, or vigour.

Question her proudly; let thy looks be stern.
Shak.

Set aside all arrogancy and proudness. Latimer.

Proud-pied (prôud'pid), a. Gorgeously variegated. 'Proud-pied April dressed in all his trim.' Shak.

Proud-stomached (prôud'stum-akt), a. Of a haughty spirit; haughty; high-tempered; apt to take offence.

If you get a parcel of proud-stomached teachers that set the young dogs a rebelling, what else can you look for?
Dickens.

Provable (prôv'a-bl), a. Capable of being proved.

Proof supposes something provable. J. S. Mill.

Provableness (prôv'a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being provable; the capacity or capability of being proved.

Provably (prôv'a-bl-ly), adv. In a manner capable of proof.

Provand, Provant (prôv'and, prôv'ant), n. [Fr. provende, lit. that which is provided, provender. See PROVENDER.] Provender.

Camels in the war, who have their provand
Only for bearing burdens.
Shak.
I tell thee, one pease was a soldier's provant a whole day at the destruction of Jerusalem.
Bern. & Fl.

Provand, Provant (prôv'and, prôv'ant), a. In mil. antiq. provided for the use of the general body of the soldiers; hence, of common or inferior quality. 'A poor provant rapier, no better.' B. Jonson.

The good wheaten bread of the Flemings were better than the provant rye-bread of the Swede.
Sir H. Scott.

Provant (prôv'ant), v.t. To supply with provender or provisions. 'To provant and victual moreover this monstrous army of strangers.' Nash.

Prove (prôv), v.t. pret. & pp. proved; ppr. proving. [O. Fr. proover, pruver, Mod. Fr. prouver, from L. probô, to try, test, prove, lit. to test the good quality of, from probus, good (whence probability). But A. Sax. profan, to prove, borrowed directly from the Latin, has as much claim as the French prover to be the ancestor of the modern prove and proof.] 1. To try or ascertain by an experiment, or by a test or standard; to test; to make trial of; as, to prove by various experiments the strength of gunpowder; to prove the contents of a vessel by comparing it with a standard measure.

Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.
1 Thes. v. 21.

And another said, I have bought five yoke of oxen, and I go to prove them.
Luke xiv. 19.

2. To evince, establish, or ascertain as truth, reality, or fact, by argument, reasoning, induction, or by testimony or other evidence; to demonstrate. 'The truths that never can be proved.' Tennyson.

Give me the ocular proof
Make me to see; or, at the least, so prove it
That the probation bear no hinge or lock
To hang a doubt on.
Shak.

3. To establish the authenticity or validity of; to obtain probate of; as, to prove a will. See PROBATE.—4. To gain personal experience of; to try by suffering or encountering. Let him in arms the power of Turnus prove.
Dryden.

5. In arith. to show or ascertain the correctness of by a farther calculation. Thus, in subtraction, if the difference between two numbers added to the lesser number makes a sum equal to the greater, the correctness of the subtraction is proved.—To prove mastery, to make trial of skill; to try who does best or has the mastery. He would often run, leap or prove mastery with his chief couriers.
Kneller.

SYN. To try, test, verify, justify, confirm, establish, evince, manifest, show, demonstrate.

Prove (prôv), v.i. 1. To make trial; to essay.

Children prove whether they can rub upon the breast with one hand, and pat upon the forehead with another.
Bacon.

2. To be found or to have its qualities ascertained by experience or trial; as, a plant or medicine proves salutary.—3. To be ascertained by the event or something subsequent; to turn out to be; as, the report proves to be true, or proves to be false. When the inflammation ends in a gangrene, the case proves mortal.
Arbuthnot.

4. To make certain; to attain certainty. 'Believing where we cannot prove.' Tennyson.—5. To succeed. If the experiment proved not, it might be pretended that the beasts were not killed in the due time.
Bacon.

Provect (prô-vekt'), a. [L. provectus—pro, forward, and veho, vectus, to carry.] Carried forward; advanced. 'Provect in years.' Sir T. Eliot.

Provection (prô-vek'shon), n. In gram. the act of carrying the terminal letter from a previous word to the next succeeding one. when it begins with a vowel; as, the tone = that one; the tother = that other.

Proveditor (prô-vêd'it-ôr), n. [It. proveditore, from provvedere, to provide. See PROVIDE.] A purveyor; one employed to procure supplies, as for an army.

They all love the major-domo, and look upon him as their parent, their guardian, their friend, their patron, their proveditor.
Jer. Taylor.

Provedore (prôvê-dôr), n. A purveyor; a proveditor. 'An officer . . . engaged in treaties with Indians, and busied with the duties of a provedore.' W. Irving.

Proven (prôv'n), pp. [A strong form for proved, the proper pp. Its usage in English is probably only poetical.] Proved. 'Proven or no, what cared he?' Tennyson.

Count o'er the rosary of truth,
And practise precepts that are proven wise.
P. J. Bayley.

—Not proven, in Scots law, a verdict given by a jury in a criminal case when, although there is a deficiency of evidence to convict the prisoner, there is sufficient to warrant grave suspicion of his guilt.

Provençal (prov-on-sal), n. 1. A native of Provence. — 2. The Romance language formerly spoken in Provence. It is the Langue d'oc, and was the tongue used by the Troubadours. See LANGUE D'Oc.

Proverb (prov-erb), n. [Fr. proverbe; L. proverbium — pro, before, for, and verbum, a word.] 1. A short pithy sentence often repeated, expressing a well-known truth or common fact ascertained by experience or observation; a sentence which briefly and forcibly expresses some practical truth; a wise saw; an adage; a maxim.

The genius, wit, and spirit of a nation are discovered in its proverbs. Bacon.

When Johnson defined a proverb to be 'a short sentence frequently repeated by the people,' this definition would not include the most curious ones, which have not always circulated among the populace, nor does it designate the vital qualities of a proverb. The pithy quintessence of old Howell has admirably described the ingredients of an exquisite proverb to be sense, shortness, and salt.

2. A by-word; an instance of what is contemptible or hateful; a reproach or object of contempt. 'A proverb and a by-word among all people.' 1 Ki. ix. 7.—3. In Script. a moral sentence or maxim that is enigmatical; a dark saying of the wise that requires interpretation. Prov. i. 6.

His disciples say unto him, Lo! now speakest thou plainly, and thou usdest no proverb. Wycliffe's Bible.

4. pl. A canonical book of the Old Testament, containing a great variety of wise maxims, rich in practical truths and excellent rules for the conduct of all classes of men.—5. A short dramatic composition in which some proverb or popular saying is taken as the foundation of the plot. Brande & Cox.—SYN. Maxim, aphorism, apophthegm, adage, saw.

Am I not sung and proverb'd for a fool in every street? Milton.

2. To provide with a proverb.

I am proverb'd with a grandiose phrase. Shak.

Proverb (prov-erb), v.i. To utter proverbs. 'So wise in *proverb*ing.' Milton.

Proverbial (prov-er-bi-al), a. 1. Mentioned in a proverb; comprised in a proverb; used or current as a proverb; as, a proverbial saying or speech.

In case of excesses, I take the German proverbial cure, by a hair of the same beast, to be the worst in the world. Sir W. Temple.

It is proverbial that there are certain things which flesh and blood cannot bear. Dickens.

2. Pertaining to proverbs; resembling a proverb; as, to express one's self with proverbial brevity. Sir T. Browne.

Proverbialism (prov-er-bi-al-izm), n. A proverbial phrase or saying.

Proverbialist (prov-er-bi-al-ist), n. A composer, collector, or admirer of proverbs.

Proverbialize (prov-er-bi-al-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. proverbialized; ppr. proverbializing. To make into a proverb; to turn into a proverb, or to use proverbially. [Rare.]

Proverbially (prov-er-bi-al-ly), adv. In a proverbial manner or style; by way of proverb.

A convent without a library, it used to be proverbially said, was like a castle without an armoury. Craik.

Provide (prô-vid'), v.t. pret. & pp. provided; ppr. providing. [L. providere, lit. to see before—pro, before, and video, visum, to see (whence vision, visible, revise, &c.).] 1. To procure beforehand; to get, collect, or make ready for future use; to prepare.

God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering. Gen. xxii. 8.

Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses. Mat. x. 9.

Provide in this sense is often followed by against or for; as, we provide warm clothing against the inclemency of the weather; we provide necessaries against a time of need; or, we provide warm clothing for winter, &c. 2. To furnish; to supply: now followed only by with, but formerly frequently by of.

Rome, by the care of the magistrates, was well provided with corn. Arbutnot.

If I have really drawn a portrait to the knees, let some better artist provide himself of a deeper canvas, and taking these hints set the figure on its legs. Dryden.

3. To make or lay down as a previous arrangement, guarantee, or provision; as, the agreement provides that the party shall incur no loss.—4. To make a previous condition, supposition, or understanding. See PROVIDED.—5. † To foresee: a Latinism.

Nor can I blame the wishes of those severe and wise patriots, who, providing the hurts these licentious spirits may do in a state, desire rather to see fools than the wounds of private men, of princes, and nations. B. Jonson.

6. Eccl. to appoint to a benefice before it is vacant. See PROVISOR.

Provide (prô-vid'), v.i. pret. provided; ppr. providing. To procure supplies or means of defence; to take measures for counteracting or escaping an evil: followed by against or for. 'Providing against the inclemency of the weather.' Sir M. Hale.

Government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants. Burke.

Provided (prô-vid'), conj. On condition; on these terms; this being understood, conceded, or established: frequently followed by that.

If I come off, . . . she your jewel, this your jewel, and my gold are yours: provided I have your commendation for my more free entertainment. Shak.

I take your offer and will live with you, provided that you do no outrages.

On silly women or poor passengers. Shak.

[Provided, strictly speaking, is a participle, and the word being is understood, the participle provided agreeing with the whole sentence absolute, and being equivalent to 'this condition being provided, previously stipulated or established.']

Providence (prov-i-dens), n. [Fr. from L. providentia, a foresight, foreknowledge. See PROVIDE.] 1. † Foresight; timely care or preparation.

Providence is (that) whereby a man not only foreseeth commodity and incommmodity, prosperity and adversity, but also consisteth, and therewith endeavourth, as well to repel annoyance, as to attain and get profit and advantage. Sir T. Elyot.

2. The care of God over his creatures; divine superintendence.

That to the highth of this great argument I may assert eternal providence.

And justify the ways of God to men. Milton.

Hence—3. God, regarded as exercising forecast, care, and direction for and over his creatures; the divine being or power.

The world was all before them, where to choose Their place of rest, and Providence their guide. Milton.

4. Something due to an act of providential intervention; an act or event in which the care of God is directly exhibited: often used colloquially as we use mercy or blessing.

It was a providence the battalion at Jutog was restrained from revolt. W. H. Russell.

5. Frugality; prudence in the management of one's concerns; economy.

My heart shall be my own, my vast expence Reduced to bounds, by timely providence. Dryden.

Provident (prov-i-dent), a. [L. providens, ppr. of providere, to provide. It is virtually the same word as prudent, as providence = prudence.] 1. Foreseeing wants and making provision to supply them; forecasting; cautious; prudent in preparing for future exigencies: sometimes followed by of.

First crept The parsimonious cmmet, provident Of future. Milton.

Orange is what Augustus was, Brave, wary, provident, and bold. Walter.

2. Foreseeing; having an anticipatory sense of: with of. [Rare.]

The little Maid again, provident of her domestic destiny, takes with preference to Dolls. Carlyle.

3. Frugal; economical.—SYN. Forecasting, cautious, careful, prudent, frugal, economical.

Providential (pro-vi-den-shal), a. Effected by the providence of God; referrible to divine providence; proceeding from divine direction or superintendence; as, the providential contrivance of things; a providential escape from danger.

This thin, this soft contenance of the air, Shows the wise author's providential care. Blackmore.

Providentially (pro-vi-den-shal-ly), adv. In a providential manner; by means of God's providence.

Every animal is providentially directed to the use of its proper weapons. Ray.

Providently (prov-i-dent-ly), adv. In a provident manner; with prudent foresight; with wise precaution in preparing for the future.

Nature having designed water-fowl to fly in the air and live in the water, she providently makes their feathers of such a texture that they do not admit the water. Boyle.

Providentness (prov-i-dent-ness), n. State of being provident; providence; foresight; carefulness; prudence. Ascham.

Provider (prô-vid-er), n. One who provides, furnishes, or supplies; one that procures what is wanted.

Here's money for my meat; I would have left it on the board so soon As I had made my meal, and parted thence With prayers for the provider. Shak.

Providore (prô-vid-dor), n. [See PROVIDORE.] A provider; a purveyor. De Vos.

Province (prov-ins), n. [Fr.; L. provincia, a province.] 1. Originally, a country of considerable extent, which being reduced under Roman dominion was new modelled, subjected to the command of a governor sent from Rome, and to such taxes and contributions as the Romans saw fit to impose.

Judas now and all the Promised Land Reduced a provincia under Roman yoke, Obeys Tiberius. Milton.

Pseudo-tetramera (sū-dō-te-tram'ēr-a), n. pl. The third general section of the order Coleoptera or beetles, comprising those beetles which have the tarsi apparently four-jointed, although in reality consisting of five joints, the fourth being so exceedingly minute as to have escaped the notice of the tarsal systematists, who gave to these the sectional name of Tetramera.

Pseudothyrum (sū-dō-thī'r-um), n. [Gr. pseudos, falsehood, and thyra, a door.] In arch. a false door.

Pseudo-tinea (sū-dō-tī-nē-a), n. [Gr. pseudos, falsehood, and L. tinea, a moth.] The bee-moth (Galleria cereana), the larvæ of which feed on wax, and are terrible enemies to bees. They sometimes enfold the bees in their webs to such an extent as to destroy the community. See GALLERIA.

Pseudo-toxin (sū-dō-tōk'sin), n. [Gr. pseudos, falsehood, and tozikon, poison.] A brownish-yellow substance obtained from the watery extract of belladonna. It is not a pure substance, and owes its poisonous action to the presence of atropin.

Pseudo-volcanic (sū-dō-vol-kān'ik), a. Pertaining to or produced by a pseudo-volcano.

Pseudo-volcano (sū-dō-vol-kā-nō), n. A volcano that emits smoke and sometimes flame, but no lava; also, a burning mine of coal.

Pseudovum (sū-dō-vum), n. pl. Pseudova (sū-dō'va), [Gr. pseudos, falsehood, and L. ovum, an egg.] In zool. one of the egg-like bodies from which the young of the viviparous aphids are produced. They differ from true ova only in being produced in organs which want certain important parts of the fully formed female reproductive system, and in undergoing development without impregnation.

Pshaw (shā), exclam. An expression of contempt, disdain, or dislike.

Pshaw (shā), v. i. To utter the interjection pshaw; to evidence marks of discontent or contempt.

My father travelled homewards in none of the best of moods, pshawing and pishing all the way down. Sterne.

Paidium (sū'di-um), n. A genus of tropical plants belonging to the nat. order Myrtaceæ. See GUAVA.

Pailanthropic (sū-lan'throp-ik), a. Of, pertaining to, or embodying pailanthropy. Coleridge.

Pailanthropism, Pailanthropy (sū-lan'throp-izm, sū-lan'throp-ī), n. [See below.] The doctrine or belief of the mere human existence of Christ.

Pailanthropist (sū-lan'throp-ist), n. [Gr. psilos, bare, mere, and anthrōpos, man.] One who believes that Christ was a mere man; a humanitarian.

The schoolmen would perhaps have called you Unitists; but your proper name is Pailanthropist—believers in the mere human nature of Christ. Coleridge.

Pailology (sū-lō'lō-jī), n. [Gr. psilos, mere, and logos, discourse.] Love of idle talk. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Pailomelane (sū-lō-mē-lān), n. [Gr. psilos, smooth, and melas, black.] An ore of manganese occurring in smooth botryoidal forms, and massive, and having a colour nearly steel-gray. It occurs in Devonshire, Cornwall, and in most manganese mines.

Pailophyton (sū-lō-fī'ton), n. [Gr. psilos, smooth, and phyton, a plant.] A fossil genus of lycopodiaceous plants, found in great profusion in the Devonian strata of Canada and the state of New York.

Pallothron (sū-lō-thron), n. [Gr., from psilos, to strip or peel, from psilos, smooth, bare.] A depilatory; a medicine or application for removing hair.

Pittaceous (sit-tā'shus), a. Of or relating to the Pittacidae or the parrot tribe generally.

Pittacid (sit-tā-sid), a. Same as Pittaceous.

Pittacidae (sit-tā-sī-dē), n. pl. [L. pittacus, Pittacidae.

1. Head and foot of Aracana. 2. Do. of Blue-bellied Lorikeet. 3. Do. of Goliath Aratoo. 4. Head of Ash-coloured Gray Parrot.

from Gr. pittakos, a parrot.] The parrot tribe, a family of scansorial birds, comprising over 300 species, of which the genus Pittacus is the type. The true parrots are mostly inhabitants of tropical America, and their prevailing colour is green. Other well-known forms are African. The cockatoos, the love-birds, and the lorikeets belong to the Melanesian and Australian province. The lories inhabit the Melanesian province. The true macaws are exclusively American; and the parrakeets are exclusively confined to the eastern hemisphere, being especially characteristic of Australia. H. A. Nicholson. See PARROT.

Pittaculus (sit-tak'ū-lā), n. See LOVE-BIRD.

Pittacus (sit-tā-kus), n. A genus of scansorial birds, comprehending several different species of parrots.

Psadic (sō-ad'ik), a. In anat. relating to, connected with, or constituted by the peasæ. 'The psadic plexus.' Owen.

Psosæ (sō'sæ), n. [From Gr. psos, a muscle of the loin.] The name of two inside muscles of the loin.

Psocidae (sō'sī-dē), n. pl. A family of minute neuropterous insects, of which the genus Psocus is the type.

Psocus (sō'kus), n. [Gr. psōchō, to rub or grind down.] A genus of very small neuropterous insects, the type of the family Psocidae. They are extremely active, and live under the bark of trees, in wood, old books, &c. The P. pulsatarius, or Atropis pulsatarius, which is found in collections of dried plants, is remarkable for producing a slight ticking noise.

Psophia (sō'fī-a), n. [Gr. psophos, noise.] A genus of grallatorial birds, belonging to the family Gruidae. The agami (P. crepitans) or trumpeter is a native of South America.

Psora (sō'ra), n. [Gr.] The itch.

Psoralea (sō-rā-lē-a), n. [Gr. psoraleos, scurfy, from psōra, scurf, in allusion to the appearance of the calyx and most parts of the plants.] A genus of evergreen shrubs and herbs, belonging to the nat. order Leguminosæ. The species are numerous, inhabiting different parts of the world, some of them ornamental, and all of easy culture. P. esculenta is the bread-root of North America. The roots, like the tubers of the potato, are employed as food. Several species are employed medicinally.

Psoriasis (sō-rī-a-sis), n. [Gr. from psōra, the itch.] (a) The itch. (b) A cutaneous affection, consisting of patches of rough, amorphous scales, continuous or of indeterminate outline, generally accompanied by chaps and fissures. Dunglison.

Psoric (sō'rik), a. Relating to or connected with psora or the itch.

Psorio (sō'rik), n. A medicine for the itch.

Psorophthalmia (sō-rof-thā'mī-a), n. [Gr. psōra, the itch, and ophthalmia, inflammation of the eye.] Itch of the eyelids; inflammation of the eyelids with ulceration. Psorospermis (sō-rō-spēr'mī-s), n. pl. [Gr. psōros, itchy, scabby, and sperma, seed.] The name given to certain vesicular, usually caudate, bodies, that occur as parasites on and within the bodies of fishes. They are probably embryonic forms of some of the Gregarinidæ. See PANHISTOPHYTON.

Psychal (sū'kal), a. [Gr. psychē, the soul.] Of or pertaining to the soul; psychic.

Psyche (sū'kē), n. [Gr. psychē, the soul.] 1. The soul; the mind. — 2. A sort of mythical or allegorical personification of the human soul, a beautiful maiden, whose charming story is given by the Latin writer Apuleius. She was so beautiful as to be taken for Venus herself. This goddess, becoming jealous of her rival charms, ordered Cupid or Love to inspire her with love for some contemptible wretch. But Cupid fell in love with her himself. Arising partly from her own indiscretion and partly from the hatred of Venus, with whom, however, a reconciliation was ultimately effected. Psyche by Jupiter's command, became immortal, and was for ever united with her beloved. — 3. A small planet or asteroid revolving between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered March 17, 1862, by De Gasparis.

Cupid and Psyche.—Antique.

Psychiater (sū-kī'a-tēr), n. [Gr. psychē, soul, and iater, a physician.] One who treats diseases of the mind.

Psychiatry (sū-kī'a-trī), n. Medical treatment of diseases of the mind.

Psychic, Psychical (sū'kik, sū'kik-al), a. [Gr. psychikos, from psychē, the soul.] 1. Of or belonging to the human soul or spirit or mind; psychological.

Hence the right discussion of the nature of price is a very high metaphysical and psychical problem. Ruskin.

2. Applied to that force by which spiritualists aver they hold converse with the spirit world, move inert matter without physical agency, and produce other 'spiritual' phenomena.

Psychics (sū'kiks), n. Psychology. [Rare.]

Psychism (sū'kizm), n. [Gr. psychē, the soul.] 1. The word used by Quæne to denote the doctrine that there is a fluid diffused throughout all nature, animating equally all living and organized beings, and that the difference which appears in their actions comes of their particular organization. Fleming.

2. The doctrine which maintains the existence and efficacy of psychic force.

Psychist (sū'kist), n. A believer in psychic force; a spiritualist.

Psychologic, Psychological (sū-ko-lō'jik, sū-ko-lō'jik-al), a. Pertaining to psychology or to a treatise on the soul.

Psychologically (sū-ko-lō'jik-al-ī), adv. In a psychological manner.

Psychologist (sū-kol'ō-jist), n. One who studies, writes on, or is versed in psychology.

Psychology (sū-kol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. psychē, soul, and logos, discourse.] That branch of knowledge which deals with the human soul; the doctrine of the nature and properties of the soul; that knowledge of the mind which we derive from a careful examination of the facts of consciousness; and hence psychology has been defined to be 'the science of the human mind as manifested by consciousness.'

I defined Psychology, the science conversant about the phenomena of mind, or conscious subject, as self, or ego. Sir W. Hamilton.

We may therefore pass to the old and convenient term which has lately been revived by many of our continental contemporaries, Psychology, which is intended to express with perfect simplicity the investigation of the appearances and laws of the mind apart from all ulterior applications. Archer Butler.

Psychomachy (sū-kom'a-kī), n. [Gr. psychē, the soul, mind, and machē, fight, combat.] A conflict of the soul with the body.

Psychomancy (sū-kō-man-sī), n. [Gr. psychē, the soul, mind, and manēia, pro-phary] Divination by consulting the souls of the dead, necromancy.

Psychopanychism (sī-kō-pān'ni-kizm), n. [Gr psychē, the soul, pan, all, and nyx, night, the night of the soul] The doctrine that at death the soul falls asleep and does not awake till the resurrection of the body.

Psychophysical (sī-kō-frī-kal), a. Pertaining to psychophysics; involving the action or mutual relations of the physical and physical in man.

Psychophysics (sī-kō-frī-kis), n. That branch of science which treats of the connection between nerve-action and consciousness; the doctrine or science of the physical basis of consciousness.

Psychosis (sī-kō'sis), n. [Gr psychē, the soul.] Mental constitution or condition.

It is, in fact, attended with some peculiar difficulty, because not only are we unable to make brute psychics a part of our own consciousness, but we are also deterred from learning it by a process similar to that which enables us to enter into the minds of our fellow-men—namely, rational speech.

St. George's Hospital.

Psychotria (sī-kō'trī-a), n. [Said to be from Gr psychē, life; in allusion to the powerful medical qualities of some of the species.] A very large genus of tropical plants belonging to the nat. order Rubiaceae. They are shrubs or small trees, rarely herbs, with opposite leaves and white, yellow, or pink, rather small flowers, usually placed in corymbose cymes, which are succeeded by small berry like fruits. They are natives of the tropics of both hemispheres, especially of America. Several of the species are supposed to possess considerable medicinal properties, as the P. smutiae, long celebrated as yielding the black or Peruvian, or striped ipecacuanha, and P. hirsuta. The roots of P. sulphurea and tinctoria are used in dyeing.

Psychrometer (sī-kōm'et-er), n. [Gr psychrōs, cool, and metron, measure.] A term somewhat inappropriately applied to an instrument for measuring the tension of the aqueous vapour in the atmosphere; a form of hygrometer.

Psychrometric, Psychrometrical (sī-kōm'et-rik, sī-kōm'et-rik-al), a. Of or pertaining to a psychrometer, hygrometrical.

Psychrometry (sī-kōm'et-ri), n. The measurement of the tension of the aqueous vapour in the atmosphere, hygrometry. See PSYCHROMETER.

Psychrophobia (sī-kō'fō-bī-a), n. [Gr psychrōs, cold, and phobos, fear, dread.] A dread of anything cold, especially cold water, impracticability to cold. Dysphoria.

Psylla (sī'll-a), n. The typical genus of the family Psyllidae (which see).

Psyllidae (sī'll-i-dē), n. pl. [Gr psylla, a flea, and idēs, resembling.] A family of homopterous insects, similar, in their general habits, to the Cicadidae, and powers of leaping, to the Cixiidae. The species live on plants, and have received names in accordance with the trees and vegetables they infest. Many are covered in their early stages by a cottony substance. Some produce gall-like monstrosities by puncturing the plants.

Psylla (or Chermes) mali and Psylla pyri are very injurious in orchards.

Psittacine (sī'ttī-nik), n. [Gr psittakos, to moose.] A stercoratory, or medicine which excites sneezing.

Psittacum (sī'ttī-kū), n. [Gr psittakos, to snore.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositae, sub-order Asteraceae, now usually united with Achillea. P. vulgare (Achillea Psittacum) is pungent, and provokes a flow of saliva. Its dried leaves produce sneezing. The heads of P. nana, strata, and moschata are used in the Swiss Alps as a substitute for tea. P. montana is the base of the aromatic liquor called capivi of Peru.

Psittacina (sī'ttī-kū-gā), n. [Genl. term, from psittakos, a parrot, psittacina, said to be from psittakos, quick, and psittacina, wily. The initial p has strangely intruded itself in the spelling.] A gallinaceous bird of the genus Lagopus, and belonging to the grouse family (Tetraonidae), distinguished from the true grouse (Tetrao) by having the toes as well as the tail feathered. Our common psittacina (called also white grouse) is the L. vulgaris or marina. The male is about 15 inches long, the female about an inch less. In summer the predominant colour of its plumage are speckled black, brown, or gray, but in winter the male becomes nearly pure white, and the female entirely so. It is a native of the north, or elevated and alpine regions, and is especially plentiful in Scandinavia. In this country it is to be met with only on the summits of some of our highest hills, chiefly amid the Grampians, in the Hebrides and Orkneys, and sometimes but rarely in the lofty hills of Cumberland and Wales. The willow psittacina or willow grouse (L. montanus) occurs in great abundance in the arctic regions of America and in Norway, whence great numbers are brought to the London market.

Psittichthys (sī'ttī-thīs), n. [Gr psittakos, a wing, and ichthys, a fish.] A fossil genus of bone-encased fishes belonging to the old red sandstone. The head and forepart of the body were protected by a bask of large ganoid plates fitting closely to each other. The caudal portion was free and seems to have been covered with small round enamelled scales. The Psittichthys was peculiarly characterized by the form of its pectoral fins, which were in the form of two long, curved spines, something like wings (whence the name), covered by finely tuberculated ganoid plates. They appear to have been used for defence as well as propulsion.

Psittidologist (sī'ttī-dol'o-jist), n. [Gr psittakos, a parrot, and logos, discourse.] One versed in that part of botany which treats of ferns.

Psittidology (sī'ttī-dol'o-jī), n. The science of ferns, a treatise on ferns.

Psittidomania (sī'ttī-dol'mā-nī-a), n. [Gr psittakos, a parrot, and mania, rage or madness.] A mania or excessive enthusiasm in regard to ferns. [Humorous.]

Your daughters, perhaps, have the prevailing psittidomania, and are collecting and buying ferns.

Psittis (sī'ttīs), n. [Gr psittakos, a kind of fern, from psittakos, a feather, in allusion to the feathery appearance of the fronds.] A genus of ferns belonging to the nat. order Polypodiaceae. P. aquilina (common brake or bracken) is a well-known British plant, which grows on heaths, and in pastures and woods, is used in the Highlands of Scotland for thatching houses, and its ashes afford a pretty good alkali. It has also been used in the manufacture of beer, and in medicine as an anthelmintic.

Psittocarpus (sī'ttī-kā-rpus), n. [Gr psittakos, a wing, and karpus, a fruit; the pods are girded with a broad wing.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Leguminosae, consisting of trees with alternate unequally pinnate leaves and usually handsome yellow flowers. There are about fifteen species, natives of the tropics of both worlds. P. dalbergioides yields a valuable wood, known as Andaman red wood. P. santalinus yields the red sandal or red Sanders wood of commerce. Dragon's blood is obtained from P. Druse, and P. erinaceus yields the kino of the west coast of Africa. The bark of P. fuscus is employed in dyeing.

Psittoceras (sī'ttī-kē-ras), n. [Gr psittakos, a wing, and ceras, a horn.] A genus of molluscs inhabiting the Indian Ocean; the nautilus-shells. The head is furnished with a proboscis and two tentacula, which are short. The shell is oblong, the spire short, and the operculum horny. P. marginatus is known by the name of the devil's claw. At least ten recent and twenty-seven fossil species of this genus are known.

Pterodactyl, Pterodactylus (sī'ttī-dak'tīl), n. [Gr ptērōn, a wing, and dactylus, a digit.] An extinct reptile of the genus Pterodactylus (which see).

Pterodactylous (sī'ttī-dak'tīl-us), a. Pertaining to or resembling the pterodactyl.

Pterodactylus (sī'ttī-dak'tīl-us), n. A genus of extinct flying reptiles (ptero-dactyls) of the order Pterosauria, found in the Jura limestone formation, in the lias at Lyme-Regis, in the colliate slate of Stonefield, the upper crustaceous shales of Kansas, &c. The pterodactylus had a moderately short tail, a long neck, and a large head, the jaws armed with equal and pointed teeth; most of the bones, like those of birds, were 'pneumatic,' that is, hollow and filled with air, but the chief character consisted in the excessive elongation of the outer digit (or little finger) of the forefoot, which served to support a flying membrane. Several species have been discovered.

With a long mounted head and long neck, much resembling that of a bird, but the wings, and a small trunk and tail, with insertion affixation in the skull, tooth and pharynx, and with a bird like structure of sternum and scapular arch, these creatures present an anomaly of structure as unlike their fossil contemporaries as the duck-billed ostrich-like bones of Australia to existing mammals. The toes and form show that the Pterodactylus was capable of perching on trees, of hanging against perpendicular surfaces, and of standing firmly on the ground, when, with its wings folded, it might crawl on all fours, or hop like a bird.

Howell.

1. Pterodactyl (restored). 2. Skull of Pterodactylus longirostris.

Pterodon (sī'ttī-don), n. [Gr ptērōn, a feather, and odon, a tooth.] A genus of carnassial mammals, found in the eocene strata in France, by some supposed to belong to the sarcophagous marsupials, by others held to be akin to the Hymenodon, the type of the miocene carnivorae.

Pteroglossus (sī'ttī-glō'sus), n. [Gr ptērōn, a wing, and glossos, a tongue.] A genus of birds, which with the genus Ramphastos constitutes the family Ramphastidae. See ARACAL.

Pteroma (sī'ttī-mā), n. [Gr ptērōn, a wing.] In arch, the space between the wall of the cells of a temple and the columns of the portico.

Pteromys (sī'ttī-mīs), n. [Gr ptērōn, a wing, and mys, a mouse.] A genus of rodent animals, family Sciuridae (squirrels), to which the skin of the flank, extending between the fore and hind legs, imparts the faculty of supporting themselves for a moment in the air, as with a parachute, and of making very great leaps. The European flying squirrel (P. or Sciuruspterus edwardsi) is a native of the forests in the colder parts of Europe and Asia, the American flying squirrel (P. edwardsi) lives in troops in the western parts of North America.

Pterophoridae (sī'ttī-fōr'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr ptērōn, a wing, phōros, bearing, and oidēs, resembling.] A family of small lepidopterous insects, nearly allied to the Tineidae, having for its type the genus Pterophorus. The wings are singularly divided into narrow, feathered rays, the antennae are long, slender, and scapaceous, and the legs are long and slender. The species of Pterophorus are evening visitors and may be seen flying on low plants.

Pterophyllum (ter-ô-flû'm), n. [Gr. pteron, a feather, and phyllon, a leaf.] A fossil genus of cycadaceous leaves distinguished by their veins being uniformly undivided. They occur in the lias and oolite.

Pteropidae (ter-ôp'î-dê), n. pl. A family of chiropterous mammals, called fox-bats from their long and pointed fox-like head. The type genus is Pteropus (whic see).

Pteropod (ter-ô-pod), n. A mollusc of the family Pteropoda.

Pteropoda (ter-ô-pô-da), n. pl. [Gr. pteron, a wing, and pous, podos, a foot.] Cuvier's tenth class of molluscs, comprehending those which have a natatory wing-shaped expansion on each side of the head and neck.

Pteropodus (ter-ô-pô-dus), a. Belonging to the class Pteropoda; wing-footed.

Pteropus (ter-ô-pus), n. [Gr. pteron, a wing, and pous, a foot.] A genus of the frugivorous Chiroptera, or bats. They fly occasionally in considerable flocks, and though mostly living on fruits do not refuse to eat small birds or mammals. There are several species, found chiefly in the Pacific Archipelago, but also occurring in Asia, Australia, and Africa. The P. javanicus, or fox-bat of Java, furnishes an example.

Pterosaur (ter-ô-sâr), n. A member of the Pterosauria.

Pterosauria (ter-ô-sâr'î-a), n. pl. [Gr. pteron, a wing, and saur, a lizard.] An extinct order of flying reptiles belonging to the mesozoic age, of which the pterodactyl is the type.

Pterospermum (ter-ô-spér'm), n. [Gr. pteron, a wing, and sperma, a seed: the seeds are winged.] A small genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Euphorbiaceae, inhabiting the Indian Isles and the southern parts of India. They are handsome ornamental trees, and abound in mucilage.

Pterygon, Pterygium (te-rîj'ôn, te-rîj'î-um), n. [From Gr. pteryx, pterygos, a wing.] In pathol. a varicose excrescence of the conjunctiva, of a triangular shape, and commonly occurring at the inner angle of the eye, whence it extends over the cornea.

Pterygoid (ter'î-gôid), a. [Gr. pteryx, pterygos, a wing, and goid, form.] Wing-shaped; in anat. a term applied to processes of the sphenoid bone which complete the osseous palate behind, and form distal bones in the oviparous vertebrate animals.

Pterygotus (ter'î-gô'tus), n. [Gr. pteryx, pterygos, a wing, and ôtos, an ear.] A gigantic fossil crustacean of the sub-order Euryptera, occurring chiefly in the passage-beds between the Silurian and Devonian systems. It has a long lobster-like form, composed in the main of a cephalo-thorax, an abdominal portion of several segments, and a somewhat oval telson or tail-plate. The organs of locomotion, three or four pairs in number, are all attached to the under side of the carapace, as in the king-crab.

Pterylography (ter'î-log'ra-fî), n. [Gr. pteron, a feather, hyle, a wood, growth, substance, and graphê, a writing.] A description of the feathers of birds, more especially as regards the manner in which they are arranged in special tracts on their bodies—considered an important point in reference to classification.

Pthah (tha), n. An ancient Egyptian divinity, the creator of all things and source of life, and as such father and sovereign of the gods. Pthah is really a special energy of the god Neph. He was worshipped chiefly at Memphis under the figure of a mummy-shaped male; also as a pigmy god.

Ptilocercus (tîl-ô-ser'kus), n. [Gr. ptilon, a feather, and kercos, a tail.] A genus of mammals allied to Tupia, found in Borneo, the tail of which is long, and at the end furnished on each side with longish hairs. It lives on trees. The only known species is named P. Louii, or the pentail.

Ptinidae (tîn'î-dê), n. pl. A family of beetles belonging to the section Pentamera, and sub-section Serricornes. These insects reside in old wooden erections, upon which the larvae feed. The genus Ptinus is the type of the family, and of it there are eight or nine British species, all of small size. The best-known genus is Anobium, which comprises the insects known by the name of the death-watch. See ANOBIMUM, DEATH-WATCH.

Ptinus (tî'nus), n. [Gr. ptithinô, to destroy.] A genus of coleopterous insects, the type of the family Ptinidae. The best known species is P. fur, which frequents houses and granaries. Its larvae devour dried plants, prepared skins of animals, &c. See PRIMUM.

Ptisan (tî'san), n. [L. ptisana; Gr. ptisânê, peeled barley, a drink made thereof, barley-water, from ptisâo, to peel, to husk.] 1. A decoction of barley with other ingredients. 2. In med. a weak medicinal drink containing little or no medicinal agent.

Ptolemaic (tol-ô-mâ'ik), a. [From Ptolemy, the geographer and astrologer.] Pertaining to Ptolemy.—Ptolemaic system, in astron. that maintained by Ptolemy, who supposed the earth to be fixed in the centre of the universe, and that the sun and stars revolved around it. This long received theory was rejected for the Copernican system.

Ptolemaist (tol-ô-mâ'ist), n. A believer in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy.

Ptosis (tô'sis), n. [Gr. from ptôô, to fall.] In med. a drooping or falling down of the upper eyelid, arising from paralysis of the third or motor-ocul nerve.

Ptyalin, Ptyaline (tî'al-in), n. [Gr. ptyalon, spittle, ptôô, to spit.] A sulphuretted albuminous substance contained in the saliva of the parotid gland. It differs in some of its reactions from albumen, mucin, and casein, and converts insoluble starch into glucose.

Ptyalism (tî'al-izm), n. [Gr. ptyalismos, a spitting, from ptyalôô, to spit often.] In med. salivation; a morbid and copious excretion of saliva.

Ptyalagogue (tî'al-ô-gog), n. [Gr. ptyalon, saliva, and agôgos, leading, from agô, to induce.] A medicine which causes salivation or a flow of saliva.

Ptychoceras (tî-kô'sê-ras), n. [Gr. ptychê, a fold, and keras, a horn.] A fossil genus of chambered shells of the ammonite family, characteristic of the chalk.

Ptychode (tî'kôd), n. [Gr. ptychê, a fold.] In physiol. a coating of protoplasm lining the inside of the membrane of a cell.

Ptychodus (tî'kô-dus), n. [Gr. ptychê, a fold, and odus, a tooth.] A fossil genus of cretaceous sharks, founded on their large, square, crushing teeth. These teeth are found in chalk-pits along with fin-spines.

Ptycholepis (tî-kôl'e-pis), n. [Gr. ptychê, a fold or wrinkle, and lepis, a scale.] A fossil genus of sauroid fishes occurring in the lias.

Puddle-poet (puɢ'l-pó-et), n. A low mean poet. Fuller.

Puddler (puɢ'lér), n. One who or that which puddles; specifically, one who is employed at the process of turning cast-iron into wrought-iron.

Puddle-rolls (puɢ'l-rólz), n. pl. In iron manufacture, a pair of heavy iron rollers with grooved surfaces, between which the lumps of iron, taken from the puddling furnace, after being subjected to a preliminary forging, are passed so as to be converted into rough bars.

Puddling (puɢ'ɪŋ), n. 1. In hydraulic engine, the operation of working plastic clay behind piling in a coffer-dam, the lining of a canal, or in other situation, to resist the penetration of water; also, the clay or other material used in such operation; puddle. — 2. In iron manufacture, (a) the process by which the oxygen and carbon of cast-iron are expelled in order to its conversion into malleable iron. The metal after having been refined, or separated to a certain extent from these impurities, is broken up into small pieces, and placed upon the hearth of a puddling furnace, which is very similar to the ordinary reverberatory furnace. Then it is subjected to an intense heat which partially fuses it, and while in a pasty condition the workman diligently stirs it about in all directions with iron tools, exposing every part of it in turn to the action of the flame until the required degree of purity is attained. The puddler then separates the semi-fluid mass into a certain number of portions called balls, which are successively withdrawn from the furnace and subjected to the action of the forge hammer and rollers, and thus converted into malleable iron. For the process called wet-puddling, see PIG-BOILING. (b) The lining of the hearth of a puddling furnace, consisting of ore, cinder, and scrap, which is banked up around the bosches to protect them from the heat. — Puddling furnace, a kind of reverberatory furnace for puddling iron, so constructed that it is only the heated gases that are allowed to play upon the surface of the metal. — Puddling machine, a mechanical puddler, operating either by means of mechanical rables, or by rotation of the furnace.

Then came brave glory puſſing by
In silks that whistled, who but he? G. Herbert.

5. To swell with air; to be dilated or inflated. Boyle.

Puff (puɢ), v.t. 1. To drive with a blast of wind or air. 'When the clearing north will puſſ the clouds away.' Dryden. — 2. To swell; to inflate; to dilate with air; as, a bladder puſſed with air. 'The sea puſſed up with winds.' Shak. 'The vessel puſſed her sail.' Tennyson. — 3. To swell or inflate, as with pride, vanity, conceit, or the like. 'Whose spirit with divine ambition puſſed.' Shak. — 4. To drive with a blast in scorn or contempt.

I puſſ the prostitute away. Dryden.

5. To praise with exaggeration; as, to puſſ a pamphlet; to puſſ wares. 'Puffing a court up beyond her bounds.' Bacon.

Puff-adder (puɢ'ad-ér), n. A South African snake (Crotho arietans), of the family Viperidae, and one of the most deadly in the world. It advances with its body partly immersed in the sand, its head only being clear, so that travellers are liable to tread on it. Luckily it is sluggish in its nature, and the Boshman will fearlessly put his foot on its neck, and then cut off its head for the sake of its venom, with which he poisons his arrows. It is, when full-grown, from 4 to 5 feet long, and as thick as a man's arm. It has its name from its habit of puffing up the upper part of its body when irritated.

Puff-ball (puɢ'bal), n. See LYCOOPERDON.

Puff-bird (puɢ'berd), n. A barbet: so called from puffing out the feathers.

Puffer (puɢ'ér), n. 1. One that puffs; one that praises with noisy commendation. — 2. One who attends a sale by auction for the purpose of raising the price and exciting the eagerness of bidders. Called also Bonnet and Whitebonnet. — 3. A name given to globe-fish (which see).

Puffery (puɢ'ér-i), n. Act of puffing; extravagant praise.

To my friend Sauerteig this poor seven-foot Hat-manufacturer, as the topstone of English Puffery, was very notable. Carlyle.

Puffy (puɢ'i-i), adv. In a puffy manner.

Puffin (puɢ'ɪn), n. [From puff, in allusion to its puffed-out beak.] The common name for the marine diving birds of the genus Fratercula, of the auk family, characterized by a bill much compressed and shorter than the head, having its sides transversely fer-rowed, its height at the base equal to the length, and altogether resembling that of a parrot. The common puffin (P. arcticus), also called the sea-parrot, is about 12 inches long. It has short legs placed far back, so business it is to trace thieves, &c., by their footsteps.

Pugging (pug'ing), n. 1. The process of mixing and working clay for bricks, &c. — 2. In arch. any composition laid under the boards of a floor, or on partition walls, to prevent the transmission of sound.

Pugging (pug'ing), a. Thieving.

White sheet blacking on a hedge.
Doth test my pugging tooth on edge. Shak.

Pugh (pū), exclam. A word used in contempt or disdain.

Pugil (pū'li), n. [L. pugilis, pugilum, a hand-fist.] As much as is taken up between the thumb and two first fingers.

Common Puffin (Fratercula arctica).

that it sits upright like an auk. Though the wings are short it flies with great rapidity. It lives chiefly upon small crustaceans and fishes, but from the great strength of the bill it is able to crush larger shell-fish. The female lays one egg in a burrow of its own formation, or in clefts in rocks, and sometimes in a rabbit's hole. It is a native of the arctic and northern temperate regions, and is met with in great numbers on the rocky cliffs of Great Britain and Ireland. Puffins are gregarious and migratory. There is also a genus Fulmar, but it contains birds very different from the puffin. See SHARROWATER. — 2. A kind of fungus; a foxball; a puff-ball.

Puffin-apple (puf'in-ap'l), n. A sort of apple so called. B. Jonson.

Puffiness (puf'i-ness), n. State or quality of being turpid.

Some of Voltaire's pieces are so swelled with this presumptuous puffiness, that I was forced into abstractions of the disposition I once felt to look upon him as a generous thinker. Aaron Hill.

Puffing (puf'ing), a. Given to puff or praise pompously and in exaggerated terms; given to praise anything above its due merits; bragging; boasting.

Supported by collections of money, by fomenting of vanities, by puffing intrigues and chicanes. Carlyle.

Puffingly (puf'ing-li), adv. In a puffing manner.

Puff-paste (puf'past), n. In confectionery, a rich dough for making the light friable covers of tarts, &c.

Puffy (pu'fi), a. 1. Swelled with air or any soft matter; tumid with a soft substance; as, a puffy tumour. — 2. Tumid; turpid, bombastic; as, a puffy style.

Your puffy discourse is a heap of words without any weight. Sir J. Hayward.

As the first element of a compound. 'A puffy-faced young man, who filled the chair at the head of the table.' Dickens.

Pug (pug), n. [A form of Puck (which see); applied to a dog or monkey it means literally a goblin-like creature.] 1. A small; a hobgoblin; sometimes used as a proper name. Puck. 'Such as we pugs and hobgoblins call.' Haywood. — 2. A monkey. Gay. — 3. A dwarf variety of dog; a pug-dog.

All at once a score of pugs
And poodles yell'd within. Tennyson.

† A familiar term of good fellowship or intimacy; an intimate, a crony.

Good pug, give me some capon. Morden.

† A Chaff; refuse of grain. Holland. — d. † A punk; a prostitute; a strumpet. Colgraves.

Pugaree, Puggerie (pug'ar-i, pug'er-i), n. [Hind. pagri, a turban.] A piece of muslin cloth wound round a hat or helmet in warm climates or very warm weather to protect the head by warding off the rays of the sun. Written also Pugree and Puggery.

One (slang) struck the general's helmet and lodged in his pugree. Daily News.

Pug-dog (pug'dog), n. A small dog which bears a miniature resemblance to the bulldog. It is characterized by great timidity and gentleness, is often very affectionate and good-natured, and is only kept as a pet. Pug-faced (pug'fast), a. Having a monkey-like face.

Pugged (pug'ard), a. Puckered. 'The red pugged attire of the turkey.' Dr. H. More.

Puggy (pug'ar-i), n. See PUGAREE.

Pug (pug'i), n. In India, a detective who follows up the pug or footmark; one whose in the bottom of the cylinder.

Pugnacious (pug-nā'shu), a. [L. pugna, pugna, from pugna, a fight. See PUGILISM.] Disposed to fight; inclined to fighting; quarrelsome, fighting; as, a very pugnacious fellow; as, a pugnacious disposition.

'A furious, pugnacious pope, as Julius II.' Barrow.

Pugnaciously (pug-nā'shu-li), adv. In a pugnacious manner.

Pugnaciousness (pug-nā'shu-ness), n. Same as Pugnacity. [Rare.]

Pugnacity (pug-nā'shi), n. Inclination to fight; quarrelsome. 'Keeping alive a natural pugnacity of character.' Motley.

Pug-nose (pug'nōs), a. A snub-nose.

Pug-nosed (pug'nōd), a. Having a short and thick nose.

Pug-piles (pug'piz), n. pl. Piles mortised into each other by a dovetail joint. They are also called Dove-tailed Piles.

Pug-piling (pug'pil-ing), n. A mode of fixing piles by mortising them into each other by a dove-tail joint. Also termed Dove-tailed Piling.

Pugree (pug'rē), n. See PUGAREE.

Puh (pū), interj. Same as Pugh. Shak.

Puir (puir), a. Poor. [Scotch.]

Puise (pū's), a. [O. Fr. puise, from puis, after, from L. pos, afterwards, and ad, L. nativus, born.] 1. In law, younger or inferior in rank. The several judges and barons of the divisions of the high court of justice, other than the chiefs, are called puise judges. 2. Later in time and the like. 'A puise date.' Sir M. Hale. — 3. Same as Puise. 'A puise tiller.' Shak.

Puise (pū's), n. A junior; an inferior; specifically, in law, a judge of inferior rank.

Puisey (pū'si), a. Younger; inferior; puise. Shak. [Rare.]

Puissance (pū's-ans), n. [From puissant.] 1. Power; strength; might; force. 'Arrived to pith and puissance.' Shak.

And after these King Arthur for a space,
And thro' the puissance of his table round,
Drew all their petty princes under him. Tennyson.

2. An armed force. 'Draw our puissance together.' Shak.

Puissant (pū's-ant), a. [Fr. puissant, powerful: formed as if from a participle puissens, from L. posse, to be able. See POTENT.] Powerful; strong; mighty; forcible; as, a puissant prince or empire. 'These puissants legions.' Milton.

Puissantly (pū's-ant-li), adv. In a puissant manner; powerfully; with great strength.

Puissantness (pū's-ant-ness), n. Puissance.

Puist, Puistie (pūst, pū'ti), a. [O. Fr. puist, the rank of yeoman.] In easy circumstances; snug; applied to persons in the lower ranks who have made money. [Scotch.]

Puit (pūit), n. [Fr. puits, a well.] A spring; a well; a fountain; a streamlet. 'The puits flowing from the fountains of life.' Jer. Taylor.

Puke (pūk), v. i. pret. puiked; ppr. puiking.

[Alin G. spoken, to spit.] 1. To vomit; to eject the contents of the stomach. 'The infant, mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.' Shak. — 2. To sicken; to be disgusted. He sure is green-stomached, that must eat, and puke, at such a trivial circumstance. Fellows.

Puke (pūk), v. t. To vomit; to throw up; to eject from the stomach.

Puke (pūk), n. A vomit; a medicine which excites vomiting.

Puke (pūk), a. Of a dark colour, said to be between black and russet.

Puker (pūk'er), n. 1. One who pukes or vomits. — 2. A medicine causing vomiting.

Puke-stocking (pūk'stok-ing), n. Having stockings of the colour puke. Shak. See PUKE, a.

Pulchritude (pul'kri-tūd), n. [L. pulchritudo, from pulcher, beautiful.] Beauty; handsomeness; grace; comeliness.

Pulchritude is conveyed by the outer senses into the soul, but a more intellectual faculty is that which refines it. Dr. H. More.

Pule (pūi), v. i. pret. & pp. puled; ppr. puiling.

[Fr. puiler, to make the cry represented by the syllable pieu, to pule; an imitative word. Comp. Fr. meuler, to mow, to mew.] 1. To cry like a chicken. — 2. To whine; to cry as a complaining child; to whimper.

Puler (pū'er), n. One that pules or whines; a weak person.

Pulex (pū'leks), n. [L., a flea.] A genus of apterous insects, consisting of the various species of fleas. See FLEA and PULICIDA.

Pulio (pū'li), n. In bot. a plant of the genus Pulicaria, fleabane.

Pulicaria (pū'li-kā'ri-a), n. [L. pulcio, pulicis, a flea.] Fleabane, a genus of plants, natural order Compositæ, sub-order Corymbifera. P. dysenterica (common fleabane) has its generic and its popular name from the supposed virtue of its smoke in driving away fleas, and its trivial name from its efficacy in curing dysentery, the Russian soldiers in the expedition to Persia under Marshal Keith having been cured by it.

Pulicene (pū'li-sen), a. Relating to fleas; pulicous.

Pulicidae (pū'li-si-dē), n. pl. [L. pulcio, pulicis, a flea, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] The fleas, a family of insects co-extensive with the order Aphaniptera, parasitic upon different animals.

The wings are rudimentary and in the form of scales. The larva of the common flea is an apodal (footless) grub, which spins a cocoon for itself, whence the imago emerges in about a fortnight. The genus Pulex is the type, P. irritans being the common flea. The genus Sarcophylla contains the chigoe.

Pulicose, Pulicous (pū'li-kōs, pū'li-kōs), a. [L. pulicosis, from pulcio, a flea.] Abounding with fleas.

Puling (pū'ling), p. and a. 1. Crying like a chicken; whining. 'A wretched puling fool.' Shak. — 2. Infantile; childish; trifling.

There is no room in this heart for puling low-riders. Carlyle.

Puling (pū'ling), n. A cry as of a chicken; a whining.

Let the songs be loud and cheerful, and not chirping or puling. Bacon.

Pulling (pū'ling-li), adv. In a pulling manner; with whining or complaint.

Bacon, & Fr.

Pulkha (pul'ka), n. A Laplander's travelling sledge. It is somewhat like a boat, made of light materials, and is covered with reindeer skin.

Laplander in his Pulkha.

ob, obain; oh, So, look; g, go; j, job; skin. It is dragged by a single reindeer, and is used for journeying over the snow in winter.

Pull (pul), v. t. [A. Sax. pullian, to pull; I. G. pullare, to pick, to pinch, to pull. Connections doubtful.] 1 To draw; to draw toward one or make an effort to draw, to draw forcibly, to tug; to haul; opposed to push. 'So hangs, and lolls, and weeps upon me; so hales, and pulls me.' Shak.

Then he put forth his hand and took her and pulled her in close to him into the cot.

2 To prick, to gather by the hand; as, to pull fruit; to pull fat.

He joys to pull the ripen'd pear.

3 To bear; to tend; to draw apart; but in this sense followed by some qualifying word or phrase, as, to pull in pieces; to pull counter or apart. 'Fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces.' Acts xlii. 10—4 To impress by a printing press.—5 To move by drawing or pulling, as, to pull a bell, to pull a book. 'To pull Lady Crumly and her daughter down the river.' J. Hook—To pull down, (a) to demolish or take in pieces by separating the parts, as, to pull down a house.

Pull not down my palace-towers, that are so lightly, beautifully built.

(b) To demolish, to subvert; to destroy.

In political affairs, as well as mechanical, it is easier to pull down than to build up.

(c) To bring down; to degrade; to humble.

To raise the wretched and pull down the proud.

—To pull down a side, to cause the loss or hazard of the party or side with which a person plays.

If I hold your card I shall pull down the side, I am not good at the game.

—To pull off, to separate by pulling; to pluck, also, to take off without force; as, to pull off a coat or hat.

Pull off pull off the branch of gold, And fling the damned cockle by.

—To pull on, to draw on, as, to pull on boots.

—To pull out, to draw out; to extract.—To pull up, (a) to pluck up; to tear up by the roots; hence, to extirpate; to eradicate; to destroy.

They shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them.

(b) To stimulate, to rouse or induce to make greater exertion. (c) To administer a severe reproof or admonition to. (Colloq.) (d) To apprehend or cause to be apprehended and taken before a court of justice. (Colloq.) (e) To stop by means of the reins, as, to pull up a horse when driving or riding. Hence, (f) to stop in any course of conduct, especially in a bad course.—To pull the long bow, to exaggerate, to lie boastfully. [This phrase probably had its origin when our forefathers used bows in war, in persons vaunting the length and strength of the bows they had pulled.]—To pull one through, to help through a difficulty or extricate from a difficulty.

The client, shaking hands, bemoaned Mr. V. to do his utmost to pull him through the Court of Chancery.

Pull (pul), v. t. To give a pull, to tug, to exert strength in drawing, as, to pull at a rope.—To pull apart, to separate or break by pulling, as, a rope will pull apart.—To pull through, to get through any undertaking with difficulty; just to manage.

I shall be all right, I shall pull through, my dear.

—To pull up, to draw the reins; to stop in riding or driving; to halt.

Pull (pul), n. 1 The act of pulling or drawing with force, an effort to move by drawing toward one, a pluck, a shake, a twitch.—2 A contest, a struggle. 'This wrestling pull between Corineus and Gogmagog.' Chaucer.

3 That which is pulled; specifically, (a) the lever of a counter pump or beer-pull, (b) the knob and stem of a door bell. (c) in printing, a single impression.—4 A nap, a venture, a chance, hence, an advantage; as, to have the pull over one. 'What a pull, that it's in bed.' T. Hughes. [Colloq.]

He is in the habit of passing a night in Jermyn Street—more so late to his advantage, according to the pull of the table.

5 The act of rowing a boat; an exertion in a boat with oars.

Pullia, t. [Fr. pullia.] Poultry.

Pullback (pul'bak), n. That which keeps one back or restrains from proceeding; a drawback.

We find no many pullbacks within us, no many strong and unobscured tendencies to our good inclinations.

Pullen (pul'en), n. (See PULLER) Poultry.

What have you to do with pullen or partridge?

Puller (pul'er), n. One who or that which pulls.

Pullet (pul'et), n. [Fr. poulette, dim. of poule, a hen, I. L. pulla, fem. from I. pullus, a young animal, a young fowl, a word cogn. with foal. Of same origin are poult, poultry.] A young hen or chicken.

Pullet-sperm (pul'et-sperm), n. The albuminous cords which unite the yolk of the egg to the white, treadle.

It's no pullet-sperm in my beverage.

Pulley (pul'i), n. pl. Pulleys (pul'is). [In form from Fr. poulie, a pulley, which itself is from I. G. pulsa, to pull, or K. pull; but really rather from O. K. poleyna, a pulley, from Fr. poulain, a foal or colt, then a slide or other contrivance for letting down casks into a cellar, then the rope by which the casks were lowered, and finally a pulley rope, poulain being from I. L. pullaena, from I. pullus, the young of an animal. Cogn. with foal. The names of the horse, ass, goat, and other animals are given in different languages to various mechanical contrivances. Consp. Arms, a kind of frame, or crane, an ass, a crane, a pulley, and K. crane, I. grus, or germane, with the double sense of bird and mechanical contrivance in all the three languages.] 1 A small wheel movable about an axis, and having a groove cut in its circumference over which a cord passes. The axis is supported by a kind of case or box called the block, which may either be movable or fixed to a firm support. The pulley is one of the six simple machines or mechanical powers, and is used for raising weights.

A single pulley serves merely to change the direction of motion, but several of them may be combined in various ways, by which a mechanical advantage or purchase is gained, greater or less according to their number and the mode of combination. The advantage gained by any combination or system of pulleys is readily computed by comparing the velocity of the weight raised with that of the moving power, according to the principle of virtual velocities. The friction, however, in the pulley is great, particularly when many of them are combined together. A pulley is said to be fixed when the block in which it turns is fixed, and it is said to be movable when the block is movable. In the single fixed pulley (fig. 1) there is no mechanical advantage, the power and weight being equal. It may be considered as a lever of the first kind with equal arms. In the single movable pulley (fig. 2) where the cords are parallel there is a mechanical advantage, there being an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to 2. It may be considered as a lever of the second kind, in which the distance of the power from the fulcrum is double that of the weight from the fulcrum.

In a system of pulleys (figs. 3, 4) in which the same string passes round any number of pulleys, and the parts of it between the pulleys are parallel, there is an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to the number of strings at the lower block. In a system in which each pulley hangs by a separate cord (fig. 5) and the strings are parallel, there is an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to the number of 2 whose index is the number of movable pulleys. Whatever be the mechanical arrangement of the pulleys and of the ropes the principle of all pulleys is the same, namely, the transmission of the tension of a rope without sensible diminution so as to obviate the loss of force consequent on rigidity. This term is used indifferently to denote either a single sheave or the complete block and its sheaves. See BLOCK—2 In such a wheel, generally with a nearly flat face, which being placed upon a shaft transmits power to or from the different parts of machinery, or changes the direction of motion by means of a belt or band which runs over it.—Fast pulley, one firmly attached to the shaft from which it receives or to which it communicates motion.—Loose pulley, one running free on the shaft to receive the belt and allow it still to traverse without being affected by or affecting the motion of the shafting.—Speed pulley, one communicating varying speeds with a given rate of motion of the belt or cord; a compulley (which see).—Sliding pulley, one placed upon a shaft so as to slide backwards and forwards upon it used for coupling and disengaging machinery.

Pulley (pul'i), v. t. To raise or hoist with a pulley. 'Being pulleyed up.' Hemans. [Rare.]

Pulley-mortise (pul'i-mor'tis), n. The same as Chase-mortise (which see).

Pulley-stone (pul'i-ston), n. In geol. a name familiarly given to the siliceous pulley-like casts or moulds of the joints and stems of scutellariae. They occur in the coal-measures.

Pulicat, Pulicat (pul'i-kat), n. A kind of coloured, checkered, silk handkerchief.

Pulman-car (pul'man-kar), n. A luxuriously fitted up railway carriage of a particular build, for the use of which an extra charge is made, and which is specially adapted for sleeping in.

Pullulate (pul'i-lat), v. t. [L. pullula, from pullus, a shoot.] To germinate, to bud. 'The pullulating evil.' Warton. [Rare.]

Pullulation (pul'i-lat'yon), n. The act of germinating or budding. [Rare.]

These were the generations or pullulations of the heavenly and earthly nature.

Dr. H. More.

Pulmo-branchiata (pul'mo-bran'ki-ata), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, and Gr. branchia, a gill.] An order of gastropod molluscs in which the respiratory organ is a cavity formed by the adhesion of the mantle by its margin to the neck of the animal. The walls of this cavity, which has one opening to the right, are ridged, the blood vessels whose contents are to be aerated being freely distributed beneath the delicate membrane: it is a lung adapted for aerial respiration. The greater part of them are terrestrial; some live on the banks of fresh water, and some on the sea-banks. The genera Limnaea, Planorbis, Arculicula, Helix, Limax, &c., belong to this order.

Pulmo-branchiate (pul'mo-bran'ki-ata), n. and a. One of or pertaining to the Pulmo-branchiata.

Pulmo-gasteropoda (pul'mo-gas'tro-poda), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, or gaster, the belly, and pous, podus, a foot.] Same as Pulmo-branchiata.

Pulmo-grada (pul'mo-gra'da), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, and gradior, to advance.] A name which used to be given to a tribe of annelids, including those gelatinous species which swim by the contraction of the vascular margin of the disc-shaped body, the latter being regarded as performing the functions of a kind of lung. The term included those animals commonly known as Medusae.

the principle of all pulleys is the same, namely, the transmission of the tension of a rope without sensible diminution so as to obviate the loss of force consequent on rigidity. This term is used indifferently to denote either a single sheave or the complete block and its sheaves. See BLOCK—2 In such a wheel, generally with a nearly flat face, which being placed upon a shaft transmits power to or from the different parts of machinery, or changes the direction of motion by means of a belt or band which runs over it.—Fast pulley, one firmly attached to the shaft from which it receives or to which it communicates motion.—Loose pulley, one running free on the shaft to receive the belt and allow it still to traverse without being affected by or affecting the motion of the shafting.—Speed pulley, one communicating varying speeds with a given rate of motion of the belt or cord; a compulley (which see).—Sliding pulley, one placed upon a shaft so as to slide backwards and forwards upon it used for coupling and disengaging machinery.

Pulley (pul'i), v. t. To raise or hoist with a pulley. 'Being pulleyed up.' Hemans. [Rare.]

Pulley-mortise (pul'i-mor'tis), n. The same as Chase-mortise (which see).

Pulley-stone (pul'i-ston), n. In geol. a name familiarly given to the siliceous pulley-like casts or moulds of the joints and stems of scutellariae. They occur in the coal-measures.

Pulicat, Pulicat (pul'i-kat), n. A kind of coloured, checkered, silk handkerchief.

Pulman-car (pul'man-kar), n. A luxuriously fitted up railway carriage of a particular build, for the use of which an extra charge is made, and which is specially adapted for sleeping in.

Pullulate (pul'i-lat), v. t. [L. pullula, from pullus, a shoot.] To germinate, to bud. 'The pullulating evil.' Warton. [Rare.]

Pullulation (pul'i-lat'yon), n. The act of germinating or budding. [Rare.]

These were the generations or pullulations of the heavenly and earthly nature.

Dr. H. More.

Pulmo-branchiata (pul'mo-bran'ki-ata), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, and Gr. branchia, a gill.] An order of gastropod molluscs in which the respiratory organ is a cavity formed by the adhesion of the mantle by its margin to the neck of the animal. The walls of this cavity, which has one opening to the right, are ridged, the blood vessels whose contents are to be aerated being freely distributed beneath the delicate membrane: it is a lung adapted for aerial respiration. The greater part of them are terrestrial; some live on the banks of fresh water, and some on the sea-banks. The genera Limnaea, Planorbis, Arculicula, Helix, Limax, &c., belong to this order.

Pulmo-branchiate (pul'mo-bran'ki-ata), n. and a. One of or pertaining to the Pulmo-branchiata.

Pulmo-gasteropoda (pul'mo-gas'tro-poda), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, or gaster, the belly, and pous, podus, a foot.] Same as Pulmo-branchiata.

Pulmo-grada (pul'mo-gra'da), n. pl. [L. pulmo, a lung, and gradior, to advance.] A name which used to be given to a tribe of annelids, including those gelatinous species which swim by the contraction of the vascular margin of the disc-shaped body, the latter being regarded as performing the functions of a kind of lung. The term included those animals commonly known as Medusae.

In a system of pulleys (figs. 3, 4) in which the same string passes round any number of pulleys, and the parts of it between the pulleys are parallel, there is an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to the number of strings at the lower block. In a system in which each pulley hangs by a separate cord (fig. 5) and the strings are parallel, there is an equilibrium when the power is to the weight as 1 to the number of 2 whose index is the number of movable pulleys. Whatever be the mechanical arrangement of the pulleys and of the ropes the principle of all pulleys is the same, namely, the transmission of the tension of a rope without sensible diminution so as to obviate the loss of force consequent on rigidity. This term is used indifferently to denote either a single sheave or the complete block and its sheaves. Pulmograph (pul-mo-graph), n. A member of the Pulmographs.

Pulmograph (pul-mo-graph), a. Of or pertaining to the Pulmographs, moving like a pulmograph by the alternate expansion and contraction of the body, especially of the diaphragm.

Pulmonaria (pul-mo-nā-ri-a), n. [So named from its supposed medicinal properties in diseases of the lungs, L. pulmo, a. lung.] 1. A genus of North American and European perennial plants. See Luzewort.—2. An order of arachnids, including those which breathe by pulmonary sacs or lungs, as spiders, crab-spiders, etc.

Pulmonary (pul-mo-nā-ri), a. [L. pulmonarius, from pulmo, pulmonis, a. lung.] 1. Pertaining to the lungs, affecting the lungs; as, a pulmonary disease or consumption, the pulmonary artery. Arachnid.—2. Belonging or pertaining to the arachnid order Pulmonaria. Pulmonary arachnids. Pop. Sci.

Pulmonary (pul-mo-nā-ri), n. Lungwort (which see).

Pulmonate (pul-mo-nā-tē), n. pl. Same as Pulmonobranchiata.

Pulmonate (pul-mo-nā-tē), a. Possessing lungs, having organs that act as lungs; as, the pulmonate mollusca.

Pulmonobranchiata (pul-mo-nā-brang-kī-tā), n. pl. Same as Pulmonobranchiata.

Pulmonobranchiata (pul-mo-nā-brang-kī-tā), a. and a. Same as Pulmonobranchiata.

Pulmonia (pul-mo-nī-a), a. [Fr. pulmonique, from L. pulmo, a. lung.] Same as Pulmonary. Harvey.

Pulmonic (pul-mo-nī-k), a. 1. A medicine for diseases of the lungs. Dunham.—2. One affected by a disease of the lungs.

Pulmonics are subject to consumption, and the old to asthma. Arachnid.

Pulmonifer (pul-mo-nī-fēr), n. [L. pulmo, pulmonis, a. lung, and fero, to bear.] An animal having lungs, specifically, a member of the Pulmonifera.

Pulmonifera (pul-mo-nī-fēr-a), n. pl. Same as Pulmonobranchiata.

Pulmoniferous (pul-mo-nī-fēr-us), a. Possessing lungs, or organs which act as such; belonging to the Pulmonifera.

Pulmonigrada (pul-mo-nī-grā-dā), n. pl. Same as Pulmographa.

Pulp (pulp), n. [Fr. pulpe, from L. pulpa, a. moist substance, pulp.] A moist slightly coherent mass, consisting of soft undissolved animal or vegetable matter; specifically, (a) the soft succulent part of fruit, as, the pulp of an orange.

The mummy pulp they chew, and in the red, still as they drained, occupy the brimming stream. Wilde.

(b) The material from which paper is manufactured after it is reduced to a soft uniform mass. (c) The soft vascular substance richly supplied with nerves in the interior of a tooth.

Pulp (pulp), v. t. 1. To make into pulp.—2. To deprive of the pulp or pulpy substance.

The other mode is to pulp the coffee immediately as it comes from the tree. By a simple machine a man will pulp a bushel in a minute. Bryan Edwards.

Pulp (pulp), v. i. To be or to become ripe and juicy like the pulp of fruit.

A tree should bud upon the tree of love, And pulp and ripen richer every hour. Kent.

Pulpation (pul-pa-tion), n. A kind of delicate confectionery or cake, probably made from the pulp of fruits. Nova.

Pulper (pul-pēr), n. A machine for reducing roots, as turnips, mangel-wurzel, etc., to a pulp; a root-pulper.

Pulpiness (pul-pi-nēs), n. The state of being pulpy.

Pulpit (pul-pit), n. [L. pulpitum, a scaffold, stage, desk.] 1. An elevated place or inclosed stage in a church, in which the preacher stands. Pulpits in modern churches are generally of wood, but in ancient times they were often made of stone, and richly carved. Pulpits were also sometimes erected on the outside of churches as well as within.—2. A movable desk, from which disputation pronounced their dissertations, and authors recited their works.

Produce his body to the market-place, And in the pulpit, as he became a friend, Speak in the order of his funeral. Shak.

Pulpit is frequently used adjectively, and signifying belonging, pertaining, or applicable to the pulpit; as, pulpit eloquence; pulpit oratory.—The pulpit, preachers generally; the public teaching in churches; as, the influence of the pulpit contrasted with that of the press.

None Pulpit, Buchanan, Norfolk.

Pulpit (pul-pit), v. t. To place in or supply with a pulpit. [Rare.]

Certainly it is not necessary to the amendment of Christian knowledge, that men should sit all their life long at the feet of a pulpit divine. Milton.

Pulpit (pul-pit), n. A preacher in contempt.

To chapel, where a bearded pulpit, Not preaching simple Christ to simple men, Announced the coming dawn, and foreshadowed Against the scarlet woman and her crowd. Tennyson.

Pulper (pul-pēr), n. One who preaches from a pulpit; a preacher.

O most gentle pulper! what tedious homily of love have you wearied your parishioners withal. Shak.

I have many thanks to give you, that you so quietly acquiesce me how verily the pulse of the pulpit beats in your town. Howell.

Of or pertaining to the pulpit.

Knocking of the mace, nothing such as whing. More.

pulperous. See resembling it, pulpy.

The redoubt's pulpit from With gold tassels, and vermilion shins. J. Phillips.

Pulposeness (pul-pō-senēs), n. The state or quality of being pulpy; softness and moistness.

Pulp-strainer (pul-pstrān-ēr), n. A sieve for straining pulp; specifically, a sieve for this purpose used in paper-making.

Pulpy (pul-pi), a. Like pulp; soft; fleshy; succulent; as, the pulpy covering of a nut; the pulpy substance of a peach or cherry. Arachnid.

Pulque (pul-kā), n. [Sp.] A vinous Mexican beverage obtained by fermenting the juice of the various species of the agave. It resembles cider, but has an odour similar to putrid meat.

Pulsate (pul-sāt), v. t. prot. & pp. pulsated; pp. pulsating. [L. pulsus, pulsantem, to beat, from pelle, pulsus, to drive (whence impulsus, impulsus, etc.).] To beat or throb.

The heart of a viper or frog will continue to pulsate long after it is taken from the body. Darwin.

Pulsatile (pul-sā-tīl), a. [L. pulsatile, from pulsus, to beat.] 1. Played on by beating, intended to be played on by beating, as, a pulsatile instrument.

to, such as the beating as a tamour.

The pasque-

[L. pulsatile, or throbbing in the process of the blood;

a beat of the pulse; a throb.

This pulsation involves an augmentation of the capacity of that portion of the artery in which it is observed, and it would seem to the touch as if this were chiefly effected by an increase of diameter. It seems fully proved, however, that the increased capacity is chiefly given by the elongation of the artery, which is lifted from its bed at each pulsation, and when previously straight becomes curved, the impression made upon the finger by such displacement not being distinguishable from that which results from the distention of the tube in diameter. Dr. Carpenter.

2. A beat or stroke by which some medium is affected, as in the propagation of sound. 3. In med. law, a beating without pain.

The Cornelian law, 'de injuria,' prohibited jurisdiction as well as verberation, distinguishing verberation which was accompanied with pain, from pulsation which was attended with none. Blackstone.

Pulsive (pul-siv), a. Beating, throbbing.

Pulsator (pul-sāt-ēr), n. A beater; a striker.

Pulsatory (pul-sāt-ō-ri), a. Capable of pulsating or beating, throbbing, as the heart and arteries. 'An inward, pungent, and pulsatory ache within the skull.' Watson.

Pulse (puls), n. [Fr. pouls, L. pulsus, a beating, from pelle, pulsus, to drive.] 1. In physiol. the beating or throbbing of the heart or blood-vessels, especially of the arteries. (See artery under PULSATION.)

In childhood the healthy pulse registers 100 to 110 beats a minute; in youth about 80, in maturity about 75; while in old age it sinks to about 60 and even less. In females it is somewhat higher, and during certain fevers it sometimes reaches 140 beats per minute. This motion is strongest in the heart, and from it is propagated through all the minutest branches of the arteries. In those which lie immediately under the skin it can be felt with the finger, as in the case with the radial artery, the pulsation of which is very perceptible at the wrist. The state of the pulse is therefore an indication of the action of the heart and the whole arterial system, and of the condition of the blood and the physical functions in general.—2. Any measured, regular, or rhythmical beat, any short, quick motion regularly repeated, as a medium in the transmission of light, sound, etc.; pulsation; vibration. 'The measured pulse of racing cars.' Tennyson.

The vibrations or pulses of this medium, that they may cover the alternate fits of every transmission and every reflection, must be swifter than light, and by consequence above yea, one thousand times swifter than sound. Huygens.

—To feel one's pulse (fig.) to sound one's opinion; to try or to know one's mind.

Pulse (puls), v. t. prot. & pp. pulsed; pp. pulsing. To beat, as the arteries or heart.

The heart when separated wholly from the body in some animals, continues still to pulse for a considerable time. Key.

Pulse (puls), v. t. To drive by a pulsation of the heart. [Rare.]

Pulse (puls), n. [From L. puls, potage made of meal, pulse, &c.] Leguminous plants or their seeds, as the various pulse crops in a legume, as beans, peas, &c.

With Elijah he paraded, Or as a guest with Daniel, at his pulse. Milton.

Pulse-glass (pul-sē-glas), n. An instrument intended to exhibit the ebullition of liquid at low temperatures, constructed like a areometer (which see). The bulbs are connected by a slender stem, and partially charged with water, ether, or alcohol; the superfluous air having been expelled by boiling, and the opening hermetically sealed by a blow-pipe. By grasping one of the bulbs the heat of the hand will cause the formation of vapour and drive the liquid into the other bulb, producing a violent ebullition in the latter. E. H. Knight.

Pulseless (pul-sē-lēs), a. Having no pulsation.

He lay a full half-hour on the soft, death-cold, and almost pulseless. Kingsley.

Pulselessness (pul-sē-lēs-nēs), n. Failure or cessation of the pulse.

Pulsific (pul-sī-fīk), a. [L. pulsus, a beating, and ficio, to make.] Exciting the pulse; causing pulsation. [Rare.]

Pulsimeter (pul-sī-mē-tēr), n. [L. pulsus, pulse, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the strength or quickness of the pulse.

Pulsion (pul-sion), n. [From L. pulsus, a driving, from pelle, to drive.] The act of driving forward, in opposition to suction or traction. [Rare.]

A duck it might use the motion of pulsion, yet it could never that of attraction. Dr. H. More.

Pulsive (pul-siv), a. Constraining; compulsory. 'The pulsive strain of conscience.' Merton. [Rare.]

Pulsometer (pul-som-ē-tēr), n. [L. pulsus, pulse, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument for raising water, especially when that liquid is mixed with solid matter. It acts by the condensation of waste steam sent into a reservoir, the water rushing up into the vacuum formed by the condensation.

Pultaceous (pul-tá'ahus), a. [From L. pultis, pultis, pottage.] Macerated; softened; nearly fluid.

Pultesse, t. pulvis (pul'tes, pul'tis), n. Poultice. Holland.

Pulu (pú'lu), n. The native Hawaii name for the fine silky fibres of one or more species of tree-fern. It is exported and used for the stuffing of mattresses, &c. It is largely employed by the surgeons of Holland as a styptic, acting mechanically by its great absorbent powers, and has been introduced into this country for the same purpose.

Pulverable (pul'vēr-a-bl), a. [See PULVERIZE.] Capable of being pulverized or reduced to fine powder. [Rare.]

In making the first ink, I could by filtration separate a pretty store of a black pulverable substance that remained in the fire. Boyle.

Pulveraceous (pul'vēr-ā'ahus), a. In bot. having a dusty or powdery surface; pulverulent.

Pulverate (pul'vēr-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. pulverated; ppr. pulverating. To beat or reduce to powder or dust; to pulverize. [Rare.]

Pulverin, Pulverine (pul'vēr-in), n. Ashes of barilla.

Pulverizable (pul'vēr-iz-a-bl), a. Capable of being pulverized.

Pulverization (pul'vēr-iz-ā'shon), n. The act of pulverizing or reducing to dust or powder.

Pulverize (pul'vēr-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. pulverized; ppr. pulverizing. [Fr. pulviser, from L. pulvis, pulvis, powder.] To reduce to fine powder, as by beating, grinding, &c.

The whole mixture will shoot into fine crystals, that seem to be of a uniform substance, and are consistent enough to be even brittle, and to endure to be pulverized and sifted. Boyle.

Pulverize (pul'vēr-iz), v. i. To become reduced to fine powder; to fall to dust.

Pulveriser (pul'vēr-iz-ēr), n. One who or that which pulverizes.

Pulverous (pul'vēr-us), a. Consisting of dust or powder; like powder. Smart.

Pulverulence (pul'vēr-ū-lens), n. Dustiness; abundance of dust or powder.

Pulverulent (pul'vēr-ū-lent), a. [L. pulverulentus, from pulvis, pulvis, dust.] 1. Dusty; consisting of fine powder; powdery; as, calcareous stone is sometimes found in the pulverulent form.—2. Addicted to lying and rolling in the dust, as fowls. [Rare.]

Pulvil (pul'vil), n. [See PULVILLO.] A sweet-scented powder formerly used.

The toilette, nursery of charms Completely furnished with bright beauty's arms, The patch, the powder-box, pulvil, perfumes. Gey.

Pulvil (pul'vil), v. t. To sprinkle with pulvil or a perfumed powder.

Have you pulvilled the coachman and postillon, that they may not stink of the stable. Congreve.

Pulvillo (pul-vil'lo), n. See PULVILLO.

Pulvilli, n. See PULVINILLI.

Pulvillo (pul-vil'lo), n. [L. pulvillus, a light cushion filled with perfumes, contr. from pulvinulus, a dim. of pulvinus, a cushion, a sand-bank, from pulvis, powder.] A sweet-scented powder formerly much used as a perfume, often contained in a little bag. Written also Pulvilio. 'Smells of incense, ambergris, and pulvillus.' Addison.

Pulvinar (pul-vin'ēr), n. [L.] A pillow or cushion; a medicated cushion.

Pulvinate (pul'vin-āt), a. [L. pulvinatus, bolstered.] In bot. cushion-shaped. See PULVINIFORM.

Pulvinated (pul'vin-āt-ed), a. [L. pulvinus, a pillow.] In arch. a term used to express a swelling in any portion of an order, such, for instance, as that of the frieze in the modern Ionic order. Called also Pillowed.

Pulviniform (pul-vin'ī-form), a. [L. pulvinus, a cushion, and forma, shape.] In bot. cushion-shaped; specifically, noting a cushion-like enlargement at the base of some leaves, or at the apex of some petioles; pulvinate.

Pulvinite (pul'vin-it), n. [L. pulvinus, a cushion.] A fossil bivalve found in the baculite limestone of Normandy.

Pulvinuli, Pulvilli (pul-vin'ū-ll, pul-vil'ī), n. [L., little cushions.] In entom. the cushion-like masses on the feet of dipterous insects.

Pulvinus (pul-vi'nus), n. [L., a cushion.] In bot. the cushion-like swelling sometimes occurring at the base of petioles or leaf-stalks.

Pulwar (pul'wār), n. A light, keelless, neatly built boat used on the Ganges.

Puma (pū'ma), n. [Peruv.] The cougar, American lion, or red tiger (Felis concolor). See COUGAR.

Pumicate (pū'mi-kāt), v. t. To make smooth with pumice. [Rare.]

Pumice (pū'mis), n. [L. pumex, pumicis, originally spumex, from spuma, foam, from spuo, to spit. Pounce (powder) is another form of the same word.] A substance frequently ejected from volcanoes, of various colours, gray, white, reddish brown or black; hard, rough, and porous; specifically lighter than water, and resembling the slag produced in an iron furnace. It is composed of 75 parts silica and 17 alumina, and the pores being generally in parallel rows, seems to have a fibrous structure. Pumice is of three kinds, glassy, common, and porphyritic. It is used for polishing ivory, wood, marble, metals, glass, &c.; as also for smoothing the surfaces of skins and parchment.

Etna and Vesuvius, which consist upon sulphur, shoot forth smoke, ashes, and pumice, but no water. Bacon.

Pumiceous (pū-miā'us), a. Pertaining to pumice; consisting of pumice or resembling it.

Pumice-stone (pū'mis-stōn), n. The same as Pumice.

Pumiciform (pū-mis'ī-form), a. Resembling pumice; specifically, in geol. applied to certain light spongy rocks apparently produced by igneous and gaseous action.

Pumicose (pū'mi-kōs), a. Consisting of or resembling pumice.

The cavity of the sinus was almost entirely occupied by a pumicose deposit. Sir W. Hamilton.

Pumist (pū'mi), a. Same as Pumy.

Pumie stones I hastily heat and throw. Spenser.

Pumace (pum'mās), n. Apples ground for cider; pomace.

Pummel (pum'mel), n. See POMMEL.

Pump (pump), n. [Fr. pompe, a pump. 'Of Teutonic origin, from G. pumpe, a pump, of which a fuller form is plumpe, showing that an l has been lost. Comp. Prov. G. plumpen, to pump. The G. plumpen also means to plump, to fall plump, . . . so that the sense of pumping arose from the plunging action of the piston, or as it is sometimes called the plunger, especially when made solid, as in the force-pump.' Skeat. Plump, Skeat farther derives from L. plumbum, lead.] An instrument, apparatus, or machine, consisting of a peculiar arrangement of a piston, cylinder, and valves, employed for raising water or other liquid to a higher level, or for exhausting or compressing air or other gases. (See AIR-PUMP.) Though the forms under which the hydraulic pump is constructed, and the mode in which the power is applied, may be modified in a great variety of ways, there are only three or four which can be considered as differing from each other in principle. These are the sucking or suction pump, the lift-pump, the force-pump, and the rotary or centrifugal pump. Of these the suction or common household pump is most in use, and for ordinary purposes the most convenient. The usual form and construction of this pump are shown in the annexed engraving. A piston a, is fitted to work air-tight within a hollow cylinder or barrel b; it is moved up and down by a handle connected with the piston-rod, and is provided with a valve c, opening upwards. At the bottom of the barrel is another valve f, also opening upwards, and which covers the orifice of a tube e, called the suction-tube, &c., fixed to the bottom of the barrel, and reaching to the well from which the water is to be raised. When the piston is drawn up from the bottom of the barrel the air below is rarefied, and the pressure of the external air acting on the surface of the water in the well, causes the water to rise in the suction-tube until the equilibrium is restored. After a few strokes the water will get into the barrel, the air below the piston having escaped through the piston-valve e. By continuing the strokes the water will get above the piston, and be raised along with it to the cistern d, at the top of the barrel, where it is discharged by a spout. In this pump the water should rise after the piston to the height of about 33 feet above the level of the water in the well, a column of about 33 feet of water being a balance for the pressure of the atmosphere, but practically there is great difficulty in making the apparatus perfectly air-tight, and with pumps of the ordinary construction a height above 28 feet is seldom reached. The water which gets above the piston may be raised to any convenient height. The lift-pump has also two valves and a piston, both opening upwards; but the valve in the cylinder, instead of being placed at the bottom of the barrel, is placed in the body of it, and at the height where the water is intended to be delivered. The bottom of the pump is thrust into the well a considerable way, and if the piston is supposed to be at the bottom, it is plain that as its valve opens upwards, there will be no obstruction to the water rising in the cylinder to its height in the well. When, therefore, the piston is raised, its valve will shut, and the water in the cylinder will be lifted up; the valve in the barrel will be opened, and the water will pass through it, and cannot return, as the valve opens upwards; another stroke of the piston repeats the same process, and in this way the water is raised from the well. The force-pump differs from both these in having its piston solid, or without a valve, and also in having a side pipe with a valve opening outwards, through which the water is forced to any height required, or against any pressure that may oppose it. In such pumps the plunger is frequently employed instead of the ordinary piston; this arrangement is represented in the above engraving, which is a section of the feed-pump of a steam-engine. The plunger a works air-tight through a stuffing-box b at the top of the barrel, and on being raised produces a vacuum in the pump-barrel into which the water rushes by the pipe e, and is discharged, on the descent of the plunger through the pipe d, the valves c and f serving to intercept the return of the water at each stroke. The side pipe d, however, requires the addition of an air-vessel. The chain-pump is described under a separate heading. The centrifugal or rotary pump consists of a fan-shaped wheel having passages leading from its centre to its circumference, and a casing in which the wheel is made to move very rapidly. Its circumference communicates with a delivery pipe, and its centre with a pipe leading to the water which is to be pumped.

Suction Pump.

Pump (pump), v. t. To work a pump; to raise water with a pump.

Mariners . . . while they pour out their vows to their saviour gods, at the same time fall lustily to their tackle, and pump without intermission. Harbottle.

Pump (pump), v. t. 1. To raise with a pump; as, to pump water.—2. To free from water or other fluid by a pump; as, to pump a ship.—3. To extract, procure, or obtain from; to draw out from.

Here—'tis too little, but 'tis all my store; I'll in to pump my dad, and fetch thee more. Randolph.

4. To draw out by artful interrogatories, as, to pump out secrets.—5. To examine by artful questions for the purpose of drawing out secrets.

But pump not me for politics. Chaucer.

He finally made a motion with his arm, as if he were working an imaginary pump-handle, thereby intimating that he (Mr. Trotter) considered himself as undergoing the process of being pumped by Mr. Samuel Waller. Dickens.

Pump (pump), n. [Probably from being worn for pump or ornament by persons in full dress.] A low shoe or slipper, with a single unwebbed sole, and without a heel: chiefly used in dancing.

Pump-barrel (pump/bar-el), n. The wooden or metal cylinder or tube which forms the body of a pump, and in which the piston moves.

Pump-bit (pump/bit), n. A species of large auger with removable shank, such as is commonly used for boring wooden pump-barrels.

Pump-box (pump/box), n. The piston of the common pump, having a valve opening upwards.

Pump-brake, Pump-break (pump/braik), n. The arm or handle of a pump.

Pump-chain (pump/chin), n. The chain of the chain-pump. See CHAIN-PUMP.

Pump-cistern (pump/sis-tern), n. 1. A cistern over the head of a chain-pump to receive the water, whence it is conveyed through the ship's sides by the pump-dales. 2. The name given to a contrivance to prevent chips and other matters getting to and fouling the chain-pumps.

Purana (pū-rā-nə) n. [Lit. ancient, from pur, past, before, past.] One of a class of sacred poetical writings in the Sanskrit tongue, which treat chiefly of the creation, destruction, and renovation of worlds, the genealogy and deeds of gods, heroes, and princes, the reigns of the Manu, &c. The number of the actual Puranas is stated to be eighteen, and together with the Tantras they form the main foundation of the actual popular creed of the Brahminical Hindus.

Purana (pū-rā-nə) n. Pertaining to the Puranas.

Purbeck (pūrb'ek) a. Belonging to the peninsula of Purbeck in Dorsetshire.—Purbeck beds, in geol. the uppermost members of the oolite proper, or according to other writers, the base of the Walden formation, deriving their name from the peninsula of Purbeck on the coast of Dorsetshire, where they are typically displayed. They consist of argillaceous and calcareous shales, and fresh-water limestones and marbles. They are noted for their layers of fossil vegetable earth (bird-beds) including roots, trunks, and branches of cycads and conifers.—Purbeck marble, an impure fresh water limestone obtained from the Purbeck beds. It takes on a good polish, but is deficient in durability under exposure to the air, and has hence lost much of its favour as a building-stone. Called also Purbeck Stone.

Purblind (pūrb'ind) a. [From pur in Sanskrit of altogether, quite, and bind.] 1. Quite blind. 'A gouty Brachius, many heads and no nose, or purblind Argus, all eyes and no sight.' Shak.—2. Near-sighted or dim-sighted, seeing obscurely; as, a purblind eye; a purblind mole.

Purblindly (pūrb'ind-lē) adv. In a purblind manner.

A world who would not purchase with a bribe? Milton.

4.† To expiate or recompense by a fine or forfeit.

I will be deaf to pleadings and excuses,
Nor tears nor prayers shall purchase out abuses. Shak.

5. Naut. to apply a purchase to; to raise or move by mechanical power; as, to purchase an anchor.—6.† To steal.

Purchase (pér'chás), v.t. 1.† To put forth efforts to obtain anything; to strive.

Duke John of Brabant *purchase*d greatly that the Earl of Flanders should have his daughter in marriage. Berners.

2. Naut. to draw in; as, the capstan *purchase*s space, that is, it draws in the cable space, it gains it.

Purchase (pér'chás), v.i. [See the verb.] 1.† The acquisition of anything by any means; acquirement; that which is obtained in any way, as by labour, danger, art, &c.

A beauty-waning and distressed widow . . .
Made prize and purchase of his wanton eye. Shak.

The fox repairs to the wolf's cell and takes possession of his stores; but he had little joy of the purchase. Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. The acquisition of anything by rendering an equivalent in money; buying.

It is foolish to lay out money in the purchase of repentance. Franklin.

3. That which is purchased; anything the ownership of which is obtained by giving an equivalent price in money.

A purchase which will bring him clear
Above his rent four pounds a year. Swift.

4. In law, (a) the act of obtaining or acquiring the title to lands and tenements by money, deed, gift, or any means except by descent; the acquisition of lands and tenements by a man's own act or agreement.

(b) The suing out and obtaining a writ.—5.† An attempt to acquire; an endeavour.

I'll . . . get meat to save thee
Or lose my life in the purchase. Beau. & Fl.

6.† Robbery, as well as the produce of robbery; pillage; plunder.

For on his back a heavy load he bore,
Of nightly stealth and pillage several
Which he had got abroad by purchase criminal. Spenser.

7. Any mechanical hold, advantage, power, or force applied to the raising or removing of heavy bodies; also, the mechanical advantage which is gained by the application of any power.

The head of an ox or a horse is a heavy weight acting at the end of a long lever (consequently with a great purchase) and in a direction nearly perpendicular to the joints of the supporting neck. Foley.

—To be worth so many years' purchase, is said of property that would bring in, in the specified time, an amount equal to the sum paid. Thus to buy an estate at twenty years' purchase is to buy it for a sum equivalent to the total return from it for twenty years. Hence similar phrases have come to be used in a figurative sense. Thus we speak of one's life not being worth an hour's purchase, that is, in extreme peril.

One report affirmed that M. dared not come to Yorkshire: he knew that his life was not worth an hour's purchase if he did. Charlotte Brontë.

Purchase-block (pér'chás-blok), n. Naut. a block used in moving very heavy weights.

Purchase-money (pér'chás-mun-í), n. The money paid or contracted to be paid for anything bought. Berkeley.

Purchaser (pér'chás-ér), n. 1. One who obtains or acquires the property of anything by paying an equivalent in money; a buyer.

What supports and employs productive labour, is the capital expended in setting it to work, and not the demand of purchasers for the produce of the labour when completed. J. S. Mill.

2. In law, one who acquires or obtains by conquest or by deed or gift, or in any manner other than by descent or inheritance. In this sense the word is by some authors written purchaseor.

Purchase-system (pér'chás-sis-tem), n. An arrangement by which commissions in the British army could be obtained for money. By this system more than half the first appointments and subsequent promotion of officers used to be effected. The regulation prices of commissions varied from £450 for an ensigncy or cornetcy to £4500 for a lieutenant-colonelcy, the highest commission purchasable. The system was abolished in 1871.

Puroon (pér'kon), n. The native name for a priest of the Oriental fire-worshippers.

Purdah (pur'dá), n. [Hind.] A curtain.

There were purdahs of fine matting, and doors, and flaps to pass, ere one could get inside. H. Russell.

Pure (pür), a. [Fr. pur, from L. purus, pure; from root pu seen also in skr. pá, to purify; also in compute, dispute, &c., and (modified in accordance with Grimm's law) in fire. From L. purus comes purgo, E. to purge.]

1. Separate from all heterogeneous or extraneous matter; free from mixture; unmixed, especially with anything that impairs or pollutes; as, pure water; pure clay; pure sand; pure air; pure silver or gold; pure wine; a pure, fresh voice. In pure white robes. Shak. 'Purest snow.' Shak.—2. Free from that which contaminates, stains, defiles, or blemishes; as, (a) free from moral defilement or guilt; innocent; guileless; spotless; chaste; applied to persons. 'All men true and leal, all women pure.' Tennyson.

Unto the pure all things are pure. Tit. i. 15.

(b) Free from that which vitiates, pollutes, or degrades; unadulterated; genuine; stainless: said of thoughts, actions, motives, and the like. 'Truth, wisdom, sanctitude, severe and pure.' Milton. 'Pure religion, and undefiled.' Jam. i. 27. 'A friendship as warm and as pure as any that ancient or modern history records.' Macaulay.—3. Ritually or ceremonially clean; unpolluted.

All were pure, and killed the passover. Exra vi. 30.

4. Mere; sheer; absolute; that and that only; unconnected with anything else; as, a pure villain. 'Blush for pure shame.' Shak. 'We did it for pure need.' Shak.

Hence the pure hatred with which such princes regard the freedom of discussion enjoyed by our writers and orators. Brougham.

—Pure mathematics, that portion of mathematics which treats of the principles of the science, the science as dealing with abstract magnitudes, as distinguished from applied mathematics, which treats of the application of the principles to the investigation of other branches of knowledge, or to the practical wants of life.—Pure obligation, in Scots law, an unconditional obligation. A condition is said to be purified when it is fulfilled.—Pure villenage, in feudal law, a tenure of lands by uncertain services at the will of the lord; so that the tenant is bound to do whatever is commanded of him. It is opposed to privileged villenage.—SYN. Unmixed, clear, simple, real, true, genuine, unadulterated, uncorrupted, unsullied, untarnished, unstained, stainless, clean, fair, unspotted, spotless, incorrupt, chaste, unpolluted, undefiled, immaculate, innocent, guileless, guileless, holy.

Purgament† (pér'ga-ment), n. [L. purpementum. See PURGE.] 1. A cathartic; a purge. Bacon.—2. That which is excreted from anything; excretion.

Purgation (pér'gá'shon), n. [Fr., from L. purgatio. See PURGE.] 1. The act of purging; the act of evacuating the intestines by purgatives.

Let the physician apply himself more to purgation than to alteration, because the offence is in quantity. Bacon.

2. The act of clearing, cleansing, or purifying by separating and carrying away impurities or whatever is extraneous or superfluous; purification.

We do not suppose the separation finished, before the purgation of the air began. T. Burnet.

3. The act of cleansing from the imputation of guilt; specifically, in law, the clearing of one's self from a crime of which the party was publicly suspected and accused. It was either canonical, which was prescribed by the canon law, the form whereof used in the spiritual court was that the person suspected took his oath that he was clear of the facts objected against him, and brought his honest neighbours with him to make oath that they believed he swore truly; or vulgar, which was by fire or water ordeal, or by combat. See ORDEAL.

Purgative (pér'ga-tiv), a. [Fr. purgatif.] Having the power of cleansing; usually, having the power of evacuating the intestines; cathartic.

Purging medicines have their purgative virtue in a fine spirit. Bacon.

Purgative (pér'ga-tiv), n. A medicine that evacuates the intestines; a cathartic that operates more strongly on the bowels than a laxative, stimulating the muscular and exciting increased secretion from the mucous coat. Dunglison.

Purgatory (pér'ga-tó-ri), a. [L. purgatorium, from purgo, to purge.] Tending to cleanse; cleansingly; expiatory. Burke.

Purgatory (pér'ga-tó-ri), n. 1. According to the belief of Roman Catholics and others, a place of purgation in which souls after death are purified from venial sins, or undergo the temporal punishment which, after the guilt of mortal sin has been remitted, still remains to be endured by the sinner. The ultimate eternal happiness of their souls is supposed to be secured, and they derive relief from the prayers of the faithful and from the sacrifice of the mass. The common belief in the Latin Church is that the purgatorial suffering is by fire; the Greek Church, however, does not determine its nature, but is content to regard it as through tribulation.—2. Any place or state of suffering, especially when not considered as final.

Purge (pérj), v.t. pret. & pp. purged; ppr. purging. [L. purgo, to cleanse, from purus, clean, and ago, to do, to act. See PURGE.]

1. To cleanse or purify by separating and carrying off whatever is impure, heterogeneous, foreign, or superfluous. 'That labour of Hercules in purging the stable of Augeas.' Bacon.—2. To remove by cleansing or purifying; to wash away: often followed by away and off.

Purge away our sins, for thy name's sake.
Ps. lxxix. 9.

Th' ethereal mould
Incapable of stain would soon expel
Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire
Victorious. Milton.

Yet pull not down my palace towers, that are
So lightly, beautifully built.
Perchance I may return with others there
When I have purged my guilt. Tennyson.

3. To clear from moral defilement or guilt: often followed by of, off, or from.

My soul is purged from grudging hate. Shak.

4. To clear from accusation or the charge of a crime, as in ordeal.

Marquis Dorset was hasting towards him to purge himself of some accusation. Bacon.

5. To clarify; to defecate, as liquors.—6. To operate on by means of a cathartic, or in a similar manner. 'He purged him with salt water.' Arbutnot.—7. To void. 'Their eyes purging thick amber.' Shak.

Purity (pú-ri-ti), v.t. pret. & pp. purified; ppr. purifying. [Fr. purifier; L. purifico—purus, pure, and facio, to make.] 1. To make pure or clear; to free from extraneous admixture; as, to purify liquors or metals; to purify the blood; to purify the air.—2. To free from pollution ceremonially; to cleanse from whatever renders unclean and unfit for sacred services.

Whoever hath killed any person, and whosever hath touched any slain, purify both yourselves and your captives on the third day, and on the seventh day. Num. xxxi. 19.

3. To free from guilt or the defilement of sin; to free from what is sinful, vile, or base. 'Whatever purifies, fortifies also the heart.' Dr. Blair.

Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Tit. ii. 14.

4. To clear from improprieties or barbarisms; as, to purify a language.

Purify (pú-ri-fi), v.t. To grow or become pure or clear. T. Burnet.

Purim (pú-rim), n. [Heb. pur, pl. purim, lota.] An annual festival among the Jews instituted to commemorate their preservation from the massacre with which they were threatened by the machinations of Haman: probably so called by them in irony, as Haman appears to have been much given to casting lots. Est. ix. 26.

Purism (pú-rizm), n. Practice or affectation of rigid purity; specifically, excessive nicety as to the choice of words. 'His political purism.' De Quincy.

The English language, however, it may be observed, had even already become too thoroughly and essentially a mixed tongue for this doctrine of purism to be admitted to the letter. Craik.

Purist (pú-ríst), n. [Fr. puriste.] 1. One who scrupulously aims at purity, particularly in the choice of language; one who is a rigorous critic of purity in literary style. 'Purified his vocabulary with a scrupulosity unknown to any purist.' Macaulay.—2. One who maintains that the New Testament was written in pure Greek. Mos Stuart. [Rare.]

Puritan (pú-ri-tan), n. [From L. purus, pure, through the intermediate form puritas, purity.] The name by which the dissenters from the Church of England were generally known in the reign of Elizabeth and the first two Stuarts. The name Puritan was given (probably in derision) to them on account of the superior purity of doctrine or discipline which the more rigid reformers claimed as their own, maintaining that they followed the word of God alone in opposition to all human inventions and superstitions, of which they believed the English Church to retain a considerable share, notwithstanding its alleged reformation. Hume gives this name to three parties—the political puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the puritans in discipline, who were averse to the ceremonies and government of the Episcopal Church; and the doctrinal puritans, who rigidly defended the speculative system of the first reformers. The term was reproachfully or contemptuously applied, especially by the Elizabethan dramatists, to any one who was strict and serious in his religious life, whether he conformed to the Episcopal Church or not. 'Make a puritan of the devil.' Shak.

The Puritans heard beating, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. Macaulay.

The extreme Puritan was at once known from other men by his garb, his look, his air, the sour solemnity of his face, the upturned white of his eyes, the nasal twang with which he spoke, and above all by his peculiar dialect. Macaulay.

Puritan (pú-ri-tan), a. Pertaining to the Puritans or dissenters from the Church of England. 'Puritan principles and tenets.' Bp. Sanderson.

Puritanic, Puritanical (pú-ri-tan'ik, pú-ri-tan'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the Puritans or their doctrines and practice. Hence.—2. Precise in religious matters; over-scrupulous; exact; rigid: often used in contempt or reproach. 'Puritanical and superstitious principles.' Iz. Walton.

Too dark a stole
Was o'er religion's decent features drawn
By puritanic zeal. Mason.

Puritanically (pú-ri-tan'ik-al-ly), adv. In a puritanical manner; with the exact or rigid notions or manners of the Puritans.

Puritanism (pú-ri-tan-izm), n. The doctrine, notions, or practice of Puritans. Puritanize (pú-ri-tan-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. puritanized; ppr. puritanizing. To conform to the notions of Puritans; to affect or to teach Puritanism.

Purity (pú-ri-ti), n. [Fr. purité; L. puritas, from purus. See PURE.] The condition or quality of being pure; as, (a) freedom from foreign admixture or heterogeneous matter; as, the purity of water, of wine, of spirit; the purity of drugs; the purity of metals.—(b) Cleanness; freedom from foulness or dirt; as, the purity of a garment. (c) Freedom from guilt or the defilement of sin; innocence; as, purity of heart or life. 'A nature true to the general attributes of humanity, yet exempt in its colourless purity from the vulgarizing taint of passion.' Dr. Caird. (d) Chastity; freedom from contamination by illicit sexual connection.

'Tis said that a lion will turn and see
From a maid in the pride of her purity. Byron.

(e) Freedom from any sinister or improper views; as, the purity of motives or designs. (f) Freedom from foreign idioms, from barbarous or improper words or phrases; as, purity of style or language.

Puri (péri), v.t. [Contr. for purify (which see).] To decorate with fringe or embroidery.

Purl (péri), v.i. [Sw. porla, to purl. Comp. D. borrelen, G. perlen, to bubble.] 1. To murmur, as a shallow stream flowing among stones or other obstructions; to flow or run with a gentle murmur.

My flowery theme,
A painted mistress or a purling stream. Pope.

2. To ripple; to run into eddies.

Around the adjoining brook, that purles along
The vocal grove, now fretting o'er a rock. Thomson.

3. To curl; to rise or appear in undulations.

From his lips did fly
This winding breath, which purled up to the sky. Shak.

Purl (péri), n. 1. A circle made by the motion of a fluid; a ripple; an eddy.

Whose stream an easy breath doth seem to blow,
Which on the sparkling gravel runs in purls.
As though the waves had been of silver curls. Drayton.

2. A continued murmuring sound, as of a shallow stream of water running over small stones; as, the purl of a brook.—3. Malt liquor medicated with wormwood or aromatic herbs. The name is now given to hot beer flavoured with gin, sugar, and ginger.

Purl (péri), v.t. [According to Skeat from old pirls, a whirligig, from pirl, to whirl.] To throw from horseback. [Hunting slang.]

Purlicue (purli-kú), v.t. and i. Same as Parlicue.

Purlicue (purli'ú), n. [Norm. purlieu, puraille, O. Fr. puraille, perambulation, from pur, for L. per, through, alle, a going. (See ALLEY).] Both form and sense have been influenced by Fr. lieu, place.] 1. A piece of land added to an ancient royal forest by unlawful encroachment, and afterwards disafforested and the rights remitted to the former owners, its extent being settled by perambulation (hence the name). Hence.—2. A part lying near to or adjacent; the outer portion of any place; the environs. 'The purlicue of this forest.' Shak. 'The purlicue of St. James.' Swift.—Purlicue men, in old forest law, those who had ground within the purlicue or border of a forest, and being able to dispend forty shillings a year freehold, were licensed to hunt within their own purlicues.

Purlin, Purline (pér'lin), n. In carp. a piece of timber laid horizontally resting on the principals of a roof to support the common rafters.

Purloin (pér-loin), v.t. [O. Fr. porloignier, purloignier, from L. prolongare, to prolong. See PROLONG.] 1. To take or carry away for one's self; hence, to steal; to take by theft; to flich. 'Purloined the guarded gold.' Milton.

Your better purloins your liquor, and the brewer
Sells your hog-wash. Arbutnot.

2. To take by plagiarism; to steal from books or manuscripts. 'Perverts the prophets and purloins the psalms.' Byron. Purloin (pér-loin'), v.t. To practise theft. 'Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity.' Tit. ii. 10.

equivalent; to buy; as, to purchase provisions, lands, or houses. 'The case which Abraham *purchase*d of the sons of Heth.' Gen. xxv. 10.—3. To obtain by an expense of labour, danger, or other sacrifice; as, to purchase favour with flattery.

A world who would not purchase with a bribe?

4.† To expiate or recompense by a fine or forfeit.

I will be deaf to pleadings and excuses,
Nor tears nor prayers shall purchase out abuses.

5. Naut. to apply a purchase to; to raise or move by mechanical power; as, to purchase an anchor.—6.† To steal.

Purchase (pér'chás), v.t. 1.† To put forth efforts to obtain anything; to strive.

Duke John of Brabant *purchase*d greatly that the Earl of Flanders should have his daughter in marriage.

2. Naut. to draw in; as, the capstan *purchase*s apace, that is, it draws in the cable apace, it gains it.

Purchase (pér'chás), n. [See the verb.] 1.† The acquisition of anything by any means; acquirement; that which is obtained in any way, as by labour, danger, art, &c.

A beauty-waning and distressed widow . . .
Made prize and purchase of his wanton eye.

The fox repairs to the wolf's cell and takes possession of his stores; but he had little joy of the purchase.

2. The acquisition of anything by rendering an equivalent in money; buying.

It is foolish to lay out money in the purchase of repentance.

3. That which is purchased; anything the ownership of which is obtained by giving an equivalent price in money.

A purchase which will bring him clear
Above his rent four pounds a year.

4. In law, (a) the act of obtaining or acquiring the title to lands and tenements by money, deed, gift, or any means except by descent; the acquisition of lands and tenements by a man's own act or agreement.

(b) The suing out and obtaining a writ.—5.† An attempt to acquire; an endeavour.

Of nightly stealths, and pillage several
Which he had got abroad by purchase criminal.

7. Any mechanical hold, advantage, power, or force applied to the raising or removing of heavy bodies; also, the mechanical advantage which is gained by the application of any power.

The head of an ox or a horse is a heavy weight acting at the end of a long lever (consequently with a great purchase) and in a direction nearly perpendicular to the joints of the supporting neck.

—To be worth so many years' purchase, is said of property that would bring in, in the specified time, an amount equal to the sum paid. Thus to buy an estate at twenty years' purchase is to buy it for a sum equivalent to the total return from it for twenty years.

Hence similar phrases have come to be used in a figurative sense. Thus we speak of one's life not being worth an hour's purchase, that is, in extreme peril.

One report affirmed that M. dard not come to Yorkshire: he knew that his life was not worth an hour's purchase if he did.

Purchase-block (pér'chás-blok), n. Naut. a block used in moving very heavy weights.

Purchase-money (pér'chás-mun-í), n. The money paid or contracted to be paid for anything bought.

Purchaser (pér'chás-ér), n. 1. One who obtains or acquires the property of anything by paying an equivalent in money; a buyer.

What supports and employs productive labour, is the capital expended in setting it to work, and not the demand of purchasers for the produce of the labour when completed.

2. In law, one who acquires or obtains by conquest or by deed or gift, or in any manner other than by descent or inheritance. In this sense the word is by some authors written purcharor.

Purchase-system (pér'chás-sis-tem), n. An arrangement by which commissions in the British army could be obtained for money. By this system more than half the first appointments and subsequent promotion of officers used to be effected. The regulation prices of commissions varied from £450 for an ensigncy or cornetcy to £4500 for a lieutenant-colonelcy, the highest commission purchasable. The system was abolished in 1871.

Puroon (pér'kon), n. The native name for a priest of the Oriental fire-worshippers.

Purdah (pur'dá), n. [Hind.] A curtain.

There were purdahs of fine matting, and doors, and flaps to pass, ere one could get inside.

Pure (pür), a. [Fr. pur, from L. purus, pure; from root pu seen also in Skr. pú, to purify; also in compute, dispute, &c., and (modified in accordance with Grimm's law) in fec. From L. purus comes purge, R. to purge.]

1. Separate from all heterogeneous or extraneous matter; free from mixture; unmixed, especially with anything that impairs or pollutes; as, pure water; pure clay; pure sand; pure air; pure silver or gold; pure wine; a pure, fresh voice.

In pure white robes. Shak. 'Purest snow.' Shak.—2. Free from that which contaminates, stains, defiles, or blemishes; as, (a) free from moral defilement or guilt; innocent; guileless; spotless; chaste; applied to persons. 'All men true and leal, all women pure.' Tennyson.

Unto the pure all things are pure. Tit. i. 15.

(b) Free from that which vitiates, pollutes, or degrades; unadulterated; genuine; stainless; said of thoughts, actions, motives, and the like. 'Truth, wisdom, sanctitude, severe and pure.' Milton. 'Pure religion, and undefiled.' Jam. i. 27. 'A friendship as warm and as pure as that which ancient or modern history records.' Macaulay.—3. Ritually or ceremonially clean; unpolluted.

All were pure, and killed the passover. Ezra vi. 20.

4. Mere; sheer; absolute; that and that only; unconnected with anything else; as, a pure villain. 'Blush for pure shame.' Shak.

'We did it for pure need.' Shak.

Hence the pure hatred with which such princes regard the freedom of discussion enjoyed by our writers and orators.

—Pure mathematics, that portion of mathematics which treats of the principles of the science, the science as dealing with abstract magnitudes, as distinguished from applied mathematics, which treats of the application of the principles to the investigation of other branches of knowledge, or to the practical wants of life.—Pure obligation, in Scots law, an unconditional obligation. A condition is said to be purified when it is fulfilled.—Pure villenage, in feudal law, a tenure of lands by uncertain services at the will of the lord; so that the tenant is bound to do whatever is commanded of him. Purgatory (pür-gá-to-ri), n. 1. According to the belief of Roman Catholics and others, a place of purgation in which souls after death are purified from venial sins, or undergo the temporal punishment which, after the guilt of mortal sin has been remitted, still remains to be endured by the sinner. The ultimate eternal happiness of their souls is supposed to be secured, and they derive relief from the prayers of the faithful and from the sacrifice of the mass. The common belief in the Latin Church is that the purgatorial suffering is by fire; the Greek Church, however, does not determine its nature, but is content to regard it as through tribulation.—2. Any place or state of suffering, especially when not considered as final.

Purge (pür), v.t. pret. & pp. *pur*ged; ppr. *pur*ging. [L. purgo, to cleanse, from purus, clean, and ago, to do, to act. See PURGE.]

1. To cleanse or purify by separating and carrying off whatever is impure, heterogeneous, foreign, or superfluous. 'That labour of Hercules in purging the stable of Augeas.' Bacon.—2. To remove by cleansing or purifying; to wash away: often followed by away and off.

Purge away our sins, for thy name's sake. Ps. lxxix. 9.

Th' ethereal mould
Incapable of stain would soon expel
Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire
Victorious. Milton.

Yet pull not down my palace towers, that are
So lightly, beautifully built,
Perchance I may return with others there
When I have purged my guilt. Tennyson.

make pure or clear; to free from extraneous admixture; as, to purify liquors or metals; to purify the blood; to purify the air.—2. To free from pollution ceremonially; to cleanse from whatever renders unclean and unfit for sacred services.

Whosoever hath killed any person, and whosoever hath touched any slain, purify both yourselves and your captives on the third day, and on the seventh day. Num. xxxi. 19.

3. To free from guilt or the defilement of sin; to free from what is sinful, vile, or base. 'Whatever purifies, fortifies also the heart.' Dr. Blair.

Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Tit. ii. 14.

4. To clear from improprieties or barbarisms; as, to purify a language.

Purify (pú-rí-tí), v. t. To grow or become pure or clear. T. Burnet.

Purim (pú-rim), n. [Heb. pur, pl. purim, lota.] An annual festival among the Jews instituted to commemorate their preservation from the massacre with which they were threatened by the machinations of Haman: probably so called by them in irony, as Haman appears to have been much given to casting lots. Est. ix. 26.

Purism (pú-rizm), n. Practice or affectation of rigid purity; specifically, excessive nicety as to the choice of words. 'His political purism.' De Quincy.

The English language, however, it may be observed, had even already become too thoroughly and essentially a mixed tongue for this doctrine of purism to be admitted to the letter. Craik.

Purist (pú-ríst), n. [Fr. puriste.] 1. One who scrupulously aims at purity, particularly in the choice of language; one who is a rigorous critic of purity in literary style. 'Purified his vocabulary with a scrupulousity unknown to any purist.' Macaulay.—2. One who maintains that the New Testament was written in pure Greek. Mos Stuart. [Rare.]

Puritan (pú-rí-tan), n. [From L. purus, pure, through the intermediate form puritas, purity.] The name by which the dissenters from the Church of England were generally known in the reign of Elizabeth and the first two Stuarts. The name Puritan was given (probably in derision) to them on account of the superior purity of doctrine or discipline which the more rigid reformers claimed as their own, maintaining that they followed the word of God alone in opposition to all human inventions and superstitions, of which they believed the English Church to retain a considerable share, notwithstanding its alleged reformation. Hume gives this name to three parties—the political puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the puritans in discipline, who were averse to the ceremonies and government of the Episcopal Church; and the doctrinal puritans, who rigidly defended the speculative system of the first reformers. The term was reproachfully or contemptuously applied, especially by the Elizabethan dramatists, to any one who was strict and serious in his religious life, whether he conformed to the Episcopal Church or not. 'Make a puritan of the devil.' Shak.

The Puritans heard beating, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectators. Macaulay.

The extreme Puritan was at once known from other men by his gait, his garb, his lank hair, the sour solemnity of his face, the upturned white of his eyes, the nasal twang with which he spoke, and above all by his peculiar dialect. Macaulay.

Puritan (pú-rí-tan), a. Pertaining to the Puritans or dissenters from the Church of England. 'Puritan principles and tenets.' Bp. Sanderson.

Puritanic, Puritanical (pú-rí-tan'ík, pú-rí-tan'ík-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the Puritans or their doctrines and practice. Hence—2. Precise in religious matters; over-scrupulous; exact; rigid; often used in contempt or reproach. 'Puritanical and superstitious principles.' Iz. Walton.

Too dark a stole
Was o'er religion's decent features drawn
By puritanic zeal. Mason.

Puritanically (pú-rí-tan'ík-al-í), adv. In a puritanical manner; with the exact or rigid notions or manners of the Puritans.

Puritanism (pú-rí-tan-izm), n. The doctrine, notions, or practice of Puritans.

Puritanize (pú-rí-tan-íz), v. t. pret. & pp. puritanized; ppr. puritanizing. To conform to the notions of Puritans; to affect or to teach Puritanism.

Purity (pú-rí-tí), n. [Fr. purité; L. puritas, from purus. See PURE.] The condition or quality of being pure; as, (a) freedom from foreign admixture or heterogeneous matter; as, the purity of water, of wine, of spirit; the purity of drugs; the purity of metals.—(b) Cleanliness; freedom from foulness or dirt; as, the purity of a garment. (c) Freedom from guilt or the defilement of sin; innocence; as, purity of heart or life. 'A nature true to the general attributes of humanity, yet exempt in its colourless purity from the vulgarizing taint of passion.' Dr. Caird. (d) Chastity; freedom from contamination by illicit sexual connection.

'Tis said that a lion will turn and flee
From a maid in the pride of her purity. Byron.

(e) Freedom from any sinister or improper views; as, the purity of motives or designs. (f) Freedom from foreign idioms, from barbarous or improper words or phrases; as, purity of style or language.

Purl (pér), v. t. [Contr. for purgle (which see).] To decorate with fringe or embroidery.

The officious wind her loose hayre curls,
The dew her happy linen purles. Lovelace.

Purl (pér), n. [For purgle.] 1. An emboldered puckered border; the plait or fold of a ruff or band.

Himself came in next after a triumphant chariot made of carnation velvet, enriched with purl and pearl. Sir P. Sidney.

2. An inversion of the stitches in knitting which gives to the work in those parts in which it is used a different appearance from the general surface.

Purl (pér), v. i. [Sw. porla, to purl. Comp. D. borrelen, G. perlen, to bubble. From the sound; comp. purr.] 1. To murmur, as a shallow stream flowing among stones or other obstructions; to flow or run with a gentle murmur.

about 4 miles south-west of Cairo. As the pyramids are all built on the same principle, a description of the principal one, named the Great Pyramid, or Pyramid of Cheops, may serve for all. Its base forms a square, each side of which was originally 754 feet, though now, by the removal of a coating, only 746 feet long, occupying 13 acres. It is built in platforms successively diminishing till that at the top contains only 1007 square feet. The height, according to Wilkinson, was originally 480 feet 9 inches, present height 460 feet, and the series of platforms present a succession of 208 steps, up which the ascent is made. The interior, entered 49 feet above the base of the north face, contains numerous chambers, one of which, called the King's Chamber, is 34½ feet long, 17 wide, and 19 high, and contains a sarcophagus of red granite. The whole structure, unquestionably the most stupendous stone building ever put together by the hand of man, is said by Herodotus to have employed 100,000 men for 20 years, and its solid contents have been computed at 83,111,000 cubic feet. The pyramids are supposed to have been raised over the sepulchral chambers of the ancient Egyptian kings, the first act of a monarch being to prepare his 'eternal abode.'

The Pyramids themselves, dotting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders. Fidler.

2. In geom. a solid body of a similar shape, or strictly a solid contained by a plane, triangular, square, or polygonal base, and other planes meeting in a point. This point is called the vertex of the pyramid; and the planes which meet in the vertex are called the sides, which are necessarily all triangles, having for their bases the sides of the base of the pyramid. Every pyramid is one-third of a prism that has the same base and altitude as the pyramid. Pyramids are denominated from the figures of their bases, being triangular, square, pentagonal, &c., according as the base is a triangle, a square, a pentagon, &c.—3. In anat. a conical bony eminence, situated on the posterior wall of the tympanum, immediately behind the oval aperture (fenestra ovalis) of the ear.—4. pl. In billiards, a game played with fifteen red balls and one white, the red balls being placed together in the form of a triangle or pyramid at spot, the object of the players being to try who will pocket or 'pot' the greatest number of balls. 5. Pyæra (pi-æ-ra), n. See BUFF-TIP.

Pyærgæ (pi-ærgæ), n. [Gr. pyærgos, lit. white-rump—pyæ, a rump, and argos, white.] 1. A species of antelope mentioned in the Bible, probably the addax. Deut. xiv. 5.—2. The sea-eagle or osprey.

Pyæthrix (pi-æ-thrix), n. [Gr. pyæ, posterior, and thrix, hair.] The Cochlin-China monkey (Simia nemaus).

Pygidium (pi-jid-i-um), n. [Gr. pygæ, the posterior.] 1. The ninth and last ring or segment of the abdomen of a flea. It is somewhat kidney-shaped, and exhibits twenty-five to twenty-eight longish bristles implanted in the centre of so many disc-like areolæ.—2. The terminal division of the body of a trilobite.

Pygmean (pig-mé-an), a. Pertaining to a pygmy or dwarf; very small; dwarfish. 'That Pygmean race beyond the Indian mount.' Milton.

Pygmy (pig'mi), n. [Fr. pygmée; L. pygmaeus; Gr. pygmaios, from pygmé, the distance from the elbow to the knuckles, about 13½ inches.] 1. A fabulous race of dwarfs, first mentioned by Homer as dwelling on the shores of Ocean, and who had to sustain a war against the cranes every spring.—2. A little or dwarfish person; a dwarf; also, anything little.

Pygmies are pygmies still, though perched on Alps; And pyramids are pyramids in vales. Young.

3. A species of ape; the chimpanzee. Brands & Cox.

Pygmy (pig'mi), a. Belonging to or resembling a pygmy; pygmean; dwarfish; small; little.

Pygmy (pig'mi), v.t. To dwarf; to make little.

Stand off, thou poetaster, from thy press,
Who pygmies martyrs with thy dwarf-like verse. Ward.

Pygopus (pig'ô-pus), n. [Gr. pygê, rump, and pous, a foot.] A genus of Australian lacerilian reptiles, family Scincidae, which, with the genus Pseudopus, formerly constituted the genus Bipes. On the discovery by Cuvier that, in addition to rudimentary posterior legs, there were indications of anterior feet, the members were constituted into a distinct genus under the above name.

Pyin, Pyine (pi'in), n. [Gr. pyon, pus.] A peculiar matter, besides albumen, found in solution in pus.

Pyk, Pike (p'ik), v.t. To make bare; to pick. [Scotch.]

Pyke (pik), n. In India, a foot messenger; a night watchman. Steuquler.

Pythagoras (pi-lag'ô-as), n. [Gr.] In anc. Greece, a delegate or representative of a city, sent to the Amphictyonic council.

Pyile (pyi), n. A single grain of chaff. Burns. [Scotch.]

Pyilon (pi-lon), n. In arch. the mass of building on either side of the entrance to an Egyptian temple. Gwill.

Pyiorie (pi-lor'ik), a. Pertaining to the pylorus; as, the pyloric artery.

Pyilorides, Pyilorideans (pi-lor'id-é-a, pi-lor'id-é-an), n. pl. [Gr. pyloros, a gatekeeper, and eidos, resemblance.] The gapers, a tribe of lamellibranchiate bivalves, comprehending those which have the shell nearly always equi-convex, and gaping at the two extremities.

Pyilorus (pi-lô-rus), n. [Gr. pyloros, from pylê, a gate.] The lower and right orifice of the stomach, through which the food passes on to the intestine.

Pyogenesis, Pyogenia (pi-ô-jen'e-sis, pi-ô-jen'i-a), n. [Gr. pyon, pus, and genesis, generation.] The generation of pus; the theory or process of the formation of pus.

Pyogenio (pi-ô-jen'ik), a. [See PYOGENESIS.] Having relation to the formation of pus; producing or generating pus.

Pyoid (pi-oid), a. [Gr. pyon, pus, and eidos, likeness.] Partaking of the nature of, or resembling pus.—Pyoid corpuscles, in pathol. a larger variety of pus corpuscles, containing two or more of the ordinary corpuscles.

Pyoning (pi-on-ing), n. Work of pioneers; military works raised by pioneers. Spenser.

Pyot (pi-ot), n. Same as Pyet.

Pyraacanth (pi-r'a-kanth), n. [Gr. pyra, a thorn, fiery thorn—pyr, fire, and akanthos, a thorn.] A thorn found in the south of Europe, Crataegus Pyraacantha.

Pyraacid (pi-ras'id), n. See PYRO-ACID.

Pyral (pi-ral), a. Of or pertaining to a pyre. Sir T. Browne.

Pyralides (pi-ral'id-é), n. pl. [Gr. pyralis, a kind of pigeon, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of nocturnal Lepidoptera, belonging to the general section Heterocera. Many of the species are gay-coloured, and fly in the daytime.

Pyralis (pi-r'a-lis), n. A genus of nocturnal Lepidoptera, the type of the family Pyralidae. One species (P. forficaria), the cabbage-garden pebble-moth, is very destructive in kitchen-gardens.

Pyralloides (pi-ral'ô-lid-é), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, allos, other, and lithos, a stone, alluding to its changes of colour before the blow-pipe.] A mineral found in Finland, massive and in crystals, friable and yielding to the knife. It is a white or greenish variety of pyroxene.

Pyrame (pi-ram'), n. A small water-spaniel. [French name.]

Pyramid (pi-râ-mid), n. [Fr. pyramide; L. pyramis, from Gr. pyramis, pyramidos, a pyramid. Probably an Egyptian word.] 1. A solid structure of a well-known shape, erected in different parts of the world, the most noted being those of Egypt and Mexico, the name being more exclusively and properly adopted for the former. The pyramids of Egypt commence immediately south of Cairo, continuing southwards at varying intervals for nearly 70 miles. The four largest are near Ghizeh, a village about 4 miles south-west of Cairo. As the pyramids are all built on the same principle, a description of the principal one, named the Great Pyramid, or Pyramid of Cheops, may serve for all. Its base forms a square, each side of which was originally 764 feet, though now, by the removal of a coating, only 746 feet long, occupying 13 acres. It is built in platforms successively diminishing till that at the top contains only 1067 square feet. The height, according to Wilkinson, was originally 480 feet 9 inches, present height 460 feet, and the series of platforms present a succession of 208 steps, up which the ascent is made. The interior, entered 49 feet above the base of the north face, contains numerous chambers, one of which, called the King's Chamber, is 84½ feet long, 17 wide, and 19 high, and contains a sarcophagus of red granite. The whole structure, unquestionably the most stupendous stone building ever put together by the hand of man, is said by Herodotus to have employed 100,000 men for 20 years, and its solid contents have been computed at 82,111,000 cubic feet. The pyramids are supposed to have been raised over the sepulchral chambers of the ancient Egyptian kings, the first act of a monarch being to prepare his 'eternal abode.'

The Pyramids themselves, dotting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders. Fuller.

2. In geom. a solid body of a similar shape, or strictly a solid contained by a plane, triangular, square, or polygonal base, and other planes meeting in a point. This point is called the vertex of the pyramid; and the planes which meet in the vertex are called the sides, which are necessarily all triangles, having for their bases the sides of the base of the pyramid. Every pyramid is one-third of a prism that has the same base and altitude as the pyramid. Pyramids are denominated from the figures of their bases, being triangular, square, pentagonal, &c., according as the base is a triangle, a square, a pentagon, &c.—3. In anat. a conical bony eminence, situated on the posterior wall of the tympanum, immediately behind the oval aperture (fenestra ovalis) of the ear.—4. pl. In billiards, a game played with fifteen red balls and one white, the red balls being placed together in the form of a triangle or pyramid at spot, the object of the players being to try who will pocket or 'pot' the greatest number of balls. 5. The American calumba or Indian lettuce (Fraera carolinensis). Dunghoon.

Pyramidal (pi-ram'id-al), a. [Fr. pyramidal.] 1. Pertaining to a pyramid; having the form of a pyramid; pyramidal. 'We compound the earth of cubical and fire of pyramidal atoms.' Outdworth. 'The pyramidal tomb of Caius Sestius.' Eustace.

The mystic obelisks stand upon Triangular, pyramidal, each based on a single trine of brazen tortoises. E. B. Browning.

2. In bot. having the figure of an angular cone, but more frequently used as an equivalent for conical, as the prickles of some roses, the root of the carrot, and the heads of many trees. Trease of Bot.—Pyramidal bell-flower, a plant of the genus Campanula, the C. pyramidalis, a native of Iatris and Savoy. It used to be a fashionable ornament in halls and staircases, and for being placed before fireplaces in summer.—Pyramidal muscle, in anat. a muscle in the front of the belly, so named from its shape. It arises from the pubes, and assists the rectus.—Pyramidal numbers, the third order of figurate numbers. See under FIGURATE.

Pyramidally (pi-ram'id-al-i), adv. 1. In the form of a pyramid; as, shaped pyramidally. 2. By means of, or through the instrumentality of, a pyramid. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.] Pyramidalia (pi-ram'id-é-lia), n. In conch. a genus of marine univalves found on coral reefs, sand, and sandy mud.

Pyramidellidae (pi-ram'id-é-lid-é), n. pl. A family of gasteropodous mollusca, belonging to the section Holostomata. The characteristics are, shell spiral, turreted; aperture channelled in front, with a less distinct posterior canal; lip generally expanded in the adult; operculum horny and spiral.

Pyramide, Pyramidal (pi-râ-mid'ik, pi-râ-mid'ik-al), a. Having the form of a pyramid; pyramidal. 'Pyramidal figures.' Sir T. Browne. 'Gold in pyramidal plenty piled.' Shenstone.

This bounding line (of a building) from top to bottom may either be inclined inwards, and the mass, therefore, pyramidal; or vertical, and the mass form one grand cliff; or inclined outwards, in the advancing fronts of old houses. Rushin.

Pyramidically (pir-a-mid'ik-al-ik), adv. In a pyramidal manner; in the form of a pyramid.

Pyramidalness (pir-a-mid'ik-al-nes), n. The state of being pyramidal.

Pyramidium (pir-a-mid'ion), n. In arch. the small flat pyramid which terminates the top of an obelisk.

Pyramidoid (pi-ram'id-oid), n. (Pyramid, and Gr. eidos, form.) A figure or solid resembling a pyramid. Called also Pyramoid.

Pyramidon (pi-ram'1-don), n. An organ stop of 16 or 32 feet tone on the pedals, invented by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Onseley, Bart. The pipes are of peculiar shape, being four times larger at the top than at the mouth, and for the size the tone is of remarkable gravity, resembling that of a stopped pipe in quality.

Pyramis (pir'a-mis), n. pl. Pyramides and Pyramises (pir-am'1-dés, pir'a-mis-és), [L.] A pyramid. 'Searching the inside of the greatest Egyptian pyramis.' Hakewill. 'My country's high pyramides.' Shak.

I have heard the Ptolemies' pyramises are very goodly things. Shak.

Pyramoid (pir'am-oid), n. Same as Pyramidoid.

Pyrragillite (pir-kr'il-ite), n. A hydrated silicate of alumina, protoxide of iron, magnesia, soda, and potash, found in granite in Finland. Brande & Cox.

Pyrragyrte (pir-ar'ji-rit), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, and argyros, silver.] An important ore of silver, chiefly sulphide of silver and antimony, with hexagonal crystallization, widely diffused both in the Old and in the New World.

Pyre (pir), n. [L. pyra.] A heap of combustible materials on which a dead body was laid to be burned to ashes; a funeral pile.

For nine long nights through all the dusky air The pyre thick flaming shot a dismal glare. Popé.

Make every eastern cloud a silvery pyre. Keats.
Of brightness.

Pyrene (pi'rén), n. [Gr. pyr, fire.] (C₁₀H₁₂) A hydrocarbon obtained from coal-tar.

Pyrene (pi-rén), n. [Gr. pyrén, the stone of a fruit.] In bot. the stone found in the interior of drupes and of similar fruits, caused by the hardening of the endocarp.

Pyrenean (pi-ré-né'an), n. Of or pertaining to the Pyrenées, a range of mountains between France and Spain.

Till o'er the hills her eagles flew Beyond the Pyrenean pines. Tennyson.

Pyrenette (pi-ré-nét'), n. A mineral of a grayish-black colour, found in the Pyrenées, and considered as a variety of garnet. It occurs in minute rhombic dodecahedrons.

Pyrenomyces (pi-ré-nó-mi-sé'téz), n. pl. [Gr. pyrén, the stone of a fruit, and mykés, mykétos, a mushroom.] That portion of the ascomycetous and coniomycetous fungi having a closed nuclear fruit.

Pyrethrum (pi-ré'thrum), n. [Gr. pyrethron.] A genus of plants. See FEVERFEW.

Pyretic (pi-rét'ik), n. [Gr. pyretos, burning heat, fever, from pyr, fire.] A medicine for the cure of fever.

Pyretology (pi-ré-to'ló-ji), n. [Gr. pyretos, fever, from pyr, fire, and logos, discourse.] The branch of medical science that treats of fevers.

Pyrexia, Pyrex (pi-rek'si-a, pi-rek'si), n. [Fr. pyrexie, from Gr. pyressó, to be feverish, from pyretos, fever, from pyr, fire.] Fever.

Pyrexial, Pyrexical (pi-rek'si-al, pi-rek'-alk-al), a. Pertaining to fever; feverish.

Pyrhellometer (pér-hé'll-om'et-ér), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, hellés, the sun, and metron, a measure.] An instrument devised by M. Pouillet for measuring the intensity of the heat of the sun. It consists of a shallow cylindrical vessel of thin silver or copper, containing water or mercury in which a thermometer is plunged. The upper surface of the vessel is covered with lamp-black, so as to make it absorb as much heat as possible, and the vessel is attached to a support in such a way that the upper surface can be always made to receive the rays of the sun perpendicularly. The actual amount of heat absorbed by the instrument is calculated by ordinary calorimetric means; the area of the exposed blackened surface is known, and the amount of water or mercury which has been raised through a certain number of thermometric degrees is known, and thus the absolute heating effect of the sun, acting upon a given area under the conditions of the experiment, can be readily found.

Pyridium (pi-rid'ium), n. [L. pyrum, a pear, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] In bot. same as Pome.

Pyrriform (pir'1-form), a. [L. pyrum, a pear, and forma, shape.] Obconical; having the form of a pear.

Pyritaceous (pir-i-tá'shus), a. Pertaining to pyrites. See PYRRITIC.

Pyrite (pi'rit), n. Same as Pyrites.

Hence sable coal his mussy couch extends, And stars of gold the sparkling pyrites blends. Dr. E. Darwin.

Pyrites (pi-rí'tés or pi-rí'ts), n. [Gr. pyrites, from pyr, fire.] A term originally applied to yellow sulphide of iron, because it struck fire with steel. It is in strictness still confined to this mineral; but where sulphur exists in combination with copper, cobalt, nickel, &c., the minerals are also called pyrites.—Arsenical pyrites. See MISPIKEL and LEUCOPYRITE.—Magnetic pyrites, pyrrhollite. See under MAGNETIC.—White iron pyrites. Same as Marcasite.—Yellow or copper pyrites, the sulphure of copper and iron, being the most common ore of copper.

Pyritic, Pyrritical, Pyrritous (pi-rí't'ik, pi-rí't'ik-al, pi-rí't'us), a. Pertaining to pyrites; consisting of or resembling pyrites.

Pyritiferous (pi-rí-tif-ér-us), a. Containing or producing pyrites.

Pyritize (pi-rí't-iz), v. t. pret. & pp. pyritized; ppr. pyritizing. To convert into pyrites.

Pyritology (pi-rí-to'ló-ji), n. [Pyrite, and Gr. logos, discourse.] Facts or information on pyrites.

Pyrritous (pi-rí't-us), a. Same as Pyritic.

Pyroacetic (pir'ó-a-sét'ik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and E. acetic.] Pertaining to or obtained from acetic acid, when subjected to the action of heat.—Pyroacetic spirit. Same as Acetone.

Pyro-acid (pir'ó-as-id), n. A product obtained by subjecting certain organic acids to heat.

Pyroballogy (pir'ó-bal'ó-ji), n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, balló, to throw, and logos, discourse, account.] The art or science of artillery. Sterns. [Rare.]

Pyrochloro (pir'ó-klór'), n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and chloro, green.] A mineral consisting of columbic and titanic acid, with lanthanum, potash, soda, calcium, cerium, &c.: so named from the colour it assumes under the blow-pipe. Called also Microcline.

Pyrochroa (pir'ó-kró'a), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, and chros, colour.] A genus of coleopterous insects, distinguished by its pure red colour; cardinal beetle. It is the only British genus of Pyrochroides.

Pyrochroides (pir'ó-kró'i-dés), n. pl. A family of small coleopterous insects, found in the spring and early part of the summer. They frequent leaves and flowers, and the larvae are found under the bark of trees and in rotten wood.

Pyroclitic (pir'ó-sit'rik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and E. citric.] Applied to an acid obtained by subjecting citric acid to the action of heat.

Pyro-electric (pir'ó-é-lek'trik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and E. electric.] Relating to pyro-electricity; having the property of becoming electro-polar when heated, as certain crystals; thermo-electric.

Pyro-electric (pir'ó-é-lek'trik), n. That which becomes electrified when heated.

Pyro-electricity (pir'ó-é-lek'tris'i-ti), n. A name given to electricity produced by heat, as when tourmaline becomes electric by being heated between 10° and 100° Cent.; the science which treats of electricity so produced; thermo-electricity.

Pyrogallate (pir'ó-gal'át'), n. A salt of pyrogallic acid.

Pyrogallic (pir'ó-gal'ik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and E. gallic.] Applied to an acid (C₆H₄O₆) obtained from gallic acid by the action of heat.

Pyrogenic (pir'ó-jen'ik), a. and n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and gênin, to produce.] Producing or that which tends to produce feverishness.

Pyrogenous (pi-roj'en-us), a. [Gr. pyr, fire, and gênin, to generate.] Produced by fire, igneous.

Pyrognomic (pir-og-nóm'ik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and gnómón, an index, a mark.] Applied to certain minerals which, when heated to a certain degree, exhibit a glow of incandescence, probably arising from a new disposition of their molecules.

Pyrognostic (pir-og-nos'tik), a. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and gnóséō, to know.] In mineral pertaining to the phenomena exhibited on the application of the blow-pipe.

Pyro-heliometer (pir'ó-hé-li-om'et-ér), n. Same as Pyrheliometer.

Pyrola (pi-ró-la), n. [L. pyrus, a pear-tree, from the resemblance of its leaves.] A genus of perennial plants with slender creeping root-stocks, short, almost woody stems, broad evergreen, chiefly radical leaves, and usually racemose white or pink flowers. Several species are natives of Britain, and are known by the common name of winter-green. P. rotundifolia, or round-leaved winter-green, possesses astringent properties, and was formerly used in medicine.

Pyrolaceae (pi-ró-lá-sé-s), n. pl. A group of Ericaceae of which the genus Pyrola is the type. The species are herbaceous plants, with leaves either wanting or simple, entire or toothed; flowers monopetalous, stamens hypogynous, ovary superior.

Pyrolatry (pi-ró-lá-t'ri), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, and latría, worship.] The worship of fire.

Pyroleter (pi-ró-lét-ér), n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and olýmá, to destroy.] An apparatus for the extinction of fire, especially on board ships, by which hydrochloric acid and bicarbonate of soda, partly dissolved and partly suspended in water, are pumped into a cylinder, and the carbonic acid there generated is projected on the fire.

Pyroligneous, Pyrolignio (pi-ró-lig'né-us, pi-ró-lig'ník), a. [Gr. pyr, fire, and L. lignum, from lignum, wood.] Generated or procured by the distillation of wood.—Pyroligneous acid, impure acetic acid obtained by the distillation of wood.

Pyrolignite (pi-ró-lig'nít), n. [See above.] A salt of pyroligneous acid.

Pyroligneous (pi-ró-lig'nus), a. Same as Pyroligneous.

Pyrolithic (pi-ró-lith'ik), a. [Gr. pyr, fire, and lithos, a stone.] Same as Cyanuric (which see). Called also Pyro-silic and Pyrrus.

Pyrologist (pi-ró-ló-ji-st), n. [See PYROLOGIST.] One who is versed in the doctrines of heat; an investigator of the laws of heat.

Pyrology (pi-ró-ló-ji), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, and logos, discourse.] The science of heat, latent and sensible.

Pyrolutite (pi-ró-lút'it), n. [Gr. pyr, fire, and luté, to wash.] A black ore of manganese, occurring crystallized and massive in Devonshire, Warwickshire, Thuringia, Brazil, and other places. It is the binoxide or peroxide of manganese, and is much used in chemical processes.

Pyromancy (pi-ró-man-si), n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and mantia, divination.] Divination by fire.

Pyromania (pi-ró-má-ni-a), n. [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and mania, madness.] Insanity marked by an irresistible desire to destroy by fire.

Pyromantic (pi-ró-man'tik), a. Pertaining to pyromancy.

Pyromantic (pi-ró-man'tik), n. One who pretends to divine by fire.

Pyrometer (pi-rom'et-ér), [Gr. pyr, pyros, fire, and metron, a measure.] A term originally applied to an instrument in the form of a simple metallic bar, employed by Muenchbroek about 1730, for measuring the changes produced in the dimensions of solid bodies by the application of heat. It is now applied, however, to any instrument the object of which is to measure all gradations of temperature above those that can be indicated by the mercurial thermometer. Wedgwood's pyrometer, the first which came into extensive use, was used by him for testing the heat of his pottery and porcelain kilns, and depended on the property of clay to contract on exposure to heat. Many different modes have been proposed or actually employed for measuring high temperatures; as, (a) by contraction, as in Wedgwood's; (b) by the expansion of bars of different metals; (c) by change of pressure in confined gases, as in M. Lamy's instrument; (d) by the amount of heat imparted to a cold mass, Siemens's instrument; (e) by the fusing-point of solids; (f) by conduction and radiation of heat (see Pyroscopics); (g) by colour, as red and white heat; (h) by change in velocity of sound; (i) by resolution of chemical compounds; (j) by generation of electricity, as in Becquerel's thermo-electric pyrometer; (k) by change in resistance to electricity, as the instrument invented by filaments, which may be adapted to measuring either high or low temperatures.

Pyrometric, Pyrometrical (pi-rō-mē-trik, pi-rō-mē-trik-al), a. Pertaining to the pyrometer, or to its use.

Pyrometry (pi-rō-mē-tē-ri), n. That branch of science which treats of the measurement of heat, the act or art of measuring degrees of heat.

Pyromorphite (pi-rō-mor-ft), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and morph., form.] A lead phosphate of lead.

Pyromorphous (pi-rō-mor-fus), a. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and morph., form.] In mineralogy, having the property of crystallization by fire.

Pyromonies (pi-rō-mō-nē-ē), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and monies, a rule, a law.] The science of heat.

Pyrope (pi-rōp), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and pē, the stone.] Fire-garnet or Bohemian garnet, a dark red variety of garnet, found embedded in trap tuffs in the mountains of Bohemia. It occurs also, in Saxony, in serpentine.

Pyrophorous (pi-rōf-or-us), a. [Or pyr. pyr., heat, and phous, to show.] Heated transparent by heat.

Pyrophorus (pi-rōf-or-us), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and phous, sound.] A musical instrument, in which the various notes are produced by the burning of hydrogen gas within glass tubes of various sizes and lengths.

Pyrophoric (pi-rōf-or-ik), a. Same as Pyrophorous.

Pyrophorous (pi-rōf-or-us), a. Pertaining to or resembling pyrophorus.

Pyrophorus (pi-rōf-or-us), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and phorus, bearing.] A substance which takes fire on exposure to air. Many metals (iron, lead, &c.) when exposed to the air, in a very finely divided condition, combine so rapidly with oxygen as to cause an evolution of light.

Pyrophosphate (pi-rōf-or-fāt), n. A salt of pyrophosphoric acid.

Pyrophosphoric (pi-rōf-or-fur-ik), a. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and phosphoric.] Applied to an acid (H₂P₂O₇) formed by exposing concentrated phosphoric acid to a temperature of 415° F. It resembles phosphoric acid in its general characters, but it is tetrabasic, that is, capable of forming four distinct classes or salts according as 1, 2, 3 parts or the whole of the hydrogen is replaced by metals.

Pyro-photography (pi-rō-fō-tō-fo-tō), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and photography.] A term applied to those processes in photography in which heat is used to fix the picture.

Pyrophylite (pi-rō-fil-it), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and phylon, a leaf.] A hydrated aluminic silicate occurring in foliated, leaf-like, sub-transparent masses, having a white, green, or yellow colour and pearly lustre. It forms glass with borax and also with soda.

Pyrophylite (pi-rō-fil-it), n. See Pyrophylite.

Pyrosummate (pi-rōf-or-sū-māt), n. A salt formed by the union of pyrosummic acid with a base.

Pyrosummic (pi-rōf-or-sū-mik), a. Applied to an acid (C₂H₂O₃) one of the products of the distillation of tartaric and meconic acids.

Pyrrhite (pi-rō-rit), n. An impure variety of orthite containing bitumen.

Pyroscope (pi-rō-skōp), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and skopos, to view.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of heat radiating from a hot body, or the frigorific influence of a cold body.

Pyrosis (pi-rō-sis), n. [Or pyrōsis, a burning, from pyr. pyr.] Is used, a disease of the stomach attended with a sensation of burning in the epigastrium, accompanied with an evacuation of watery fluid, usually insipid, but sometimes acid. It is commonly called Water-brash.

Pyrosmalite (pi-rōf-or-sū-māl-it), n. [Or pyr. pyr., small, small, and lithos, a stone.] A mineral of a liver-brown colour, or pistachio green, occurring in six-sided prisms, of a lamellar structure, found in Sweden. It is a silicate of iron and manganese, containing chlorite, of which when heated it exhales the odour.

Pyrosoma (pi-rō-sō-ma), n. [Or pyr. pyr., fire, and soma, a body.] A genus of phosphorescent mollusca, of the group Tunicata, inhabiting the Mediterranean and Atlantic. They unite in great numbers, forming a large hollow cylinder open at one end and closed at the other, swimming in the ocean by the alternate contraction and dilatation of its component individual animals.

Pyrosoma (pi-rō-sō-ma), n. A molluscan animal of the genus Pyrosoma.

Pyrosomidae (pi-rō-sō-mī-dē), n. pl. A family of marine mollusca, of the group Tunicata, constituting the order Dactylobranchia of Owen. The genus Pyrosoma is the type (which see).

Pyrotartaric (pi-rōf-or-tar-tar-ik), a. Applied to an acid obtained by heating tartaric acid in a close vessel.

Pyrotartaric (pi-rōf-or-tar-tar-ik), a. A salt of pyrotartaric acid.

Pyrotechnian (pi-rōf-or-tē-ki-an), n. A pyrotechnist.

Q.

Q is the seventeenth letter of the English alphabet, a consonant having the same sound as q or hard a. It is a superfluous letter in English, as the combination qu, in which it always occurs, could be equally well expressed by kw, or k alone when the u is silent. It did not occur in the Anglo-Saxon alphabet, the sound qu in Anglo-Saxon words being regularly written cw or cu, but was borrowed from the French-Latin alphabet. In Latin, as in English, this letter never occurred unless followed by u. It is now used in purely English words as well as in those derived from the French or taken directly from the Latin. It is most common as an initial letter; it never stands alone as a final, though in such words as pyxis, oblique it is really final the following vowels being then silent. In quon, quench, qu corresponds to the A. Sax. cu, in quadrangle, etc., to the Latin qu; in square it represents a former cu, while quire is a much modified form of cuire. The name of the letter is said to be from the Fr. quatre, a tail, the form being that of an O with a tail added.—Among mathematicians, Q, E, D, stand for quod erat demonstrandum, which was to be demonstrated, Q, E, F quod erat faciendum, which was to be done.—In Rom. literature and inscriptions, Q stands for Quintus.

Thomson, which enables small degrees of electricity to be measured with great precision.

Quadrantal (kwed-rant'-al), a. Pertaining to a quadrant, included in the fourth part of a circle, as, a quadrantal space. — Quadrantal triangle, in trigon., a spherical triangle which has one side equal to a quadrant or 90°.

Quadrantal (kwed-rant'-al), n. 1 A cube. [Rare] — 2 A cubical vessel used by the Romans, which contained the same quantity as the amphora (which see).

Quadrat (kwed-rat), n. [L. quadratus, squared. See QUADRATE.] 1 In printing, a piece of type-metal cast lower than a type, used for filling out spaces between letters, words, lines, &c., so as to leave a blank space on the sheet over which it is placed. Quadrats are of different sizes, as, in-quadrat, a quadrat, &c. — 2 An instrument, called also a Geometrical Square, and Line of Shadows, furnished with sights, a plummet, and index, and used for measuring altitudes, but superseded by more perfect instruments in modern use.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), a. [L. quadratus, squared, pp. of quadrus, quadratum, to make square, from quadrus, square, quadrus, four.] 1 Having four equal and parallel sides, square.

And something his hands that found a book of astronomy with figures, other round, some triangle, some quadrato. Small.

2 Square, by being the product of a number multiplied into itself. Quadrato and critical numbers. See T. Brown. — 3 Square, as typifying completeness or perfection: complete, even-balanced. A quadrato solid, wise man. Small. — 4 Sifted, fitted, applicable, corresponding.

The word quadrato, being applicable to a proper or improper composition, requires a qualified description quadrato to both. Harvey.

Quadrato bone, in anat. a name given to the special bone by the intervention of which the lower jaw of birds and reptiles articulates with the skull, thus distinguishing them from mammals, in whom the lower jaw articulates directly. Called also Oss. Quadratum.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), a. 1 A square, a surface or figure with four equal and parallel sides. 'A quadrato was the base.' Spenser. The powers militant — 2 In astron., an aspect of the heavenly bodies, in which they are distant from each other ninety degrees, or the quarter of a circle, quartile.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), s. 1 pres. & pp. quadratus; pp. quadratus. [L. quadrus, quadratus, to square. See the adjective.] To square, to suit, to correspond, to agree, to be accommodated followed by with.

Antimater's rules for apt geometry cannot be supposed to quadrato exactly with the hazy plane which have been made since his time. Adams.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), s. 1 To trim a ship's gun on its carriage and its trunnions, to adjust a gun for firing on a level range.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), a. [By quadrato, See QUADRATE.] 1 In alg. involving the square or second power of an unknown quantity, as, a quadrato equation, that is, an equation in which the unknown quantity is of two dimensions or raised to the second power, or one in which the highest power of the unknown quantity is a square — 2 In arith., a domestic applied to the system that includes the square prime and related forms. Dana.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. 1 A quadratic equation — 2 pl. That branch of algebra which treats of quadratic equations. 'First simple quadrato, secondly, affected quadrato.' Horris.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus, to square.] 1 In geom., a curve by means of which we can find straight lines equal to the circumference of circles or other curves and their several parts, a curve employed for finding the quadrature of other curves, as, the quadrato of Dinocratus, or of Tetrastemon.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus, to square, quadratum, to square.] 1 In geom., the act of squaring; the reducing of a figure to a square. Thus the finding of a square which shall contain just as much area as a circle or a triangle, is the quadrature of that circle or triangle. The quadrature of the circle is a problem of great celebrity in the history of mathematical science. The whole circular area being equal to the rectangle under the radius and a straight line equal to half the circumference, the quadrature would be obtained if the length of the circumference were assigned, and hence the particular object aimed at in attempting to square the circle is the determination of the ratio of the circumference to the diameter. This ratio can only be expressed by an infinite series, and the squaring of the circle is still an unsolved problem. 2 A quadrato, a square space. [Rare.]

And breacheth manerly with thee divide Of all things, parted by the wayward hand, His quadrato, from thy orbicular world. Shakspeare.

3 In astron., the position of one heavenly body in respect to another when distant from it 90°, as the position of the moon when distant from the sun 90° or a quarter of the circle, or when the moon is at an equal distance from the points of conjunction and opposition.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadratus, dim. of L. quadrus, a square, from quatuor, four. Quadrato is another form.] 1 In arch., square stone, brick, or tile. The term is sometimes restricted in its application to a kind of artificial stone formed of a chalky earth moulded to a square form and dried in the shade for two years — 2 A piece of turf or peat cut in a square form. [Provincial.] tions, carried at the middle-bow, in the fifteenth century. The figure represents a quadrato of the time of Edward IV.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadratus, squared = quadrus, four, and annus, year.] 1 Comprising four years, as, a quadrato period. 2 Occurring once in four years, as, quadrato games.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), adv. Once in four years.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [From quadrus = L. quadrus, four, and basia.] In chem. having four parts of base to one of acid.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus, to square.] Capable of being squared. Darwin.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus, square.] 1 A homogeneous expression of the second degree in the variables or constants. Turnary and quadrato quadrato equated to zero represent respectively curves and surfaces which have the property of cutting every line in the plane or in space in two points, and to which the name quadrato is also applied. Plane quadrato, therefore, are identical with the conic sections, and admit of three principal forms, the ellipse, hyperbola, and parabola, sub-forms of which are the circle, a pair of intersecting, and a pair of coincident lines. Branda & Cox.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = four, and apocapsa, a capsule.] In bot. having four capsules.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and cornu, a horn.] A term applied to any animal having four horns or antlers.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. In bot. having four horns or antlers.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and costa, a rib.] Having four ribs.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Quadrato (kwed-rat'), n. [L. quadrus = quadrus, four, and dent, a tooth.] In bot. having four teeth on the edge.

Hindley's Quadrant.

Under, variously constructed and mounted for different specific uses in astronomy, navigation, surveying, &c., consisting originally of a graduated arc of 90°, with an index or vernier, and either plane or telescopic sights, along with a plumb-line or spirit-level for fixing the vertical or horizontal direction. In principle and application it is the same as that of the sextant, by which it is superseded. See SEXTANT. — 2 An instrument used by artillerymen for giving a certain or moving the angle of elevation necessary to attain the desired range. In the older form, illustrated in the cut, it has a graduated arc and a plumb-line which indicates the angle of elevation upon the arc when one arm is placed within the bore, or the other is placed against the face of a piece in a perpendicular position. In a more finished and accurate form a spirit level is substituted for the plumb, and one of the branches of the instrument is pivoted and slides over the face of the arc so as to show the elevation. Called also Cumner's Square. — Quadrato of altitude, an appendage of the Cumner's Quadrant.

sally Boida, nearly allied to the boa, from which they differ in having the plates on the under surface of the tail double. They are natives of the Old World, and are found in the East Indies, South Africa, and elsewhere. They sometimes attain a length of 30 feet. They are not venomous, but kill their prey by constriction.

Pythoness (pi'thon-ess), n. [Fr. pythonesse, from Gr. Python. See PYTHIAN.] The priestess of Apollo at his temple at Delphi, who gave oracular answers; hence, any woman supposed to have a spirit of divination; a witch. 'Like Basil, to run to a pythoness.' Jer. Taylor.

She stood a moment as a pythoness
Stands on her tripod. Byron.

Pythiosis (pi'thon-ik), n. (See PYTHONES.) Oracular; pertaining to the prediction of future events; prophetic.

Pythionism (pi'thon-izm), n. The art of foretelling future events after the manner of the Delphic oracle.

Pythionist (pi'thon-ist), n. A conjurer. Cockburn.

Pyx (piks), n. [Gr. pyxis, a box, especially of box-wood, from pyxon, the box-tree.] 1. In the R. Cath. Ch. a covered vessel used for holding the consecrated host. — 2. In anat. a name for the acetabulum of the hip-bone, the cotyloid cavity; pyxis. — 3. A box or chest in which specimen coins are deposited at the Mint. — Trial of the pyx, the final trial by weight and assay of the gold and silver coins of the United Kingdom, prior to their issue from the Mint. The trial takes place periodically by a jury of goldsmiths summoned by the lord-chancellor.

and constitutes a public attestation of the standard purity of the coin. The term is also applied to the assaying of gold and silver plate, which takes place at the different assay-offices. — 4. Now, the box in which the nautical compass is suspended. Wells. Written also Pyx.

Pyx (piks), v. t. To test by weight and assay, as the coins deposited in the pyx.

Pyxidrum (pik-sid'rum), n. [Gr. pyxis, a box, and oidron, resemblance.] In bot. a capsule with a lid, as seen in henbane and in the fruit of Lagotis Olaria, the monkey-pot tree, one of the largest trees in the virgin forests of Brazil. Also applied to the sheath of mosses. See LECYTHA.

Yellow Parrot on a Pyxidrum of Lagotis Olaria.

Pyxis, Pyxine (pik-sis'i, pik-sis'i), n. pl. A natural order of lichens, comprising those known in the arctic regions as crups de roche. The order is characterized by a horizontal foliose thallus, mostly fixed by the centre, an articular disc, with the exciple distinct from the thallus, and at first closed.

Pyxis (pik'sis), n. [See PTX.] 1. A box; a pyx. — 2. In anat. the cotyloid cavity. — 3. In bot. a pyxidrum. — Pyxis Naucoria, the Mariner's Compass, a southern constellation.

Q.

Q is the seventeenth letter of the English alphabet, a consonant having the same sound as k or hard c. It is a superfluous letter in English, as the combination qu, in which it always occurs, could be equally well expressed by kw, or k alone when the u is silent. It did not occur in the Anglo-Saxon alphabet, the sound qu in Anglo-Saxon words being regularly written cw or cu, but was borrowed from the French-Latin alphabet. In Latin, as in English, this letter never occurred unless followed by u. It is now used in purely English words as well as in those derived from the French or taken directly from the Latin. It is most common as an initial letter; it never stands alone as a final, though in such words as lique, oblique it is really final, the following vowels being then silent. In queen, quench, qu corresponds to the A. Sax. cu; in quadrangle, &c., to the Latin qu, in quire it represents a former cu, while quire is a much modified form of choir. The name of the letter is said to be from the Fr. quese, a tail, the form being that of an O with a tail added. — Among mathematicians, Q. E. D. stand for quod erat demonstrandum, which was to be demonstrated; Q. E. F. quod erat faciendum, which was to be done. In Rom. literature and inscriptions, Q stands for Quintus.

Qua (kwā), adv. [L.] In the quality or character of, as being, in that, as, as, an executor qua next of kin to a deceased person; he spoke not qua a public official, but qua a private person.

Quab (kwob), n. 1. [Comp. D. kwab, kwabbe, Dan. kwab, an eel-pout; G. kwappe, quabbe, a tadpole, an eel-pout.] An old name for some kind of fish; an eel-pout, or the bull-head or miller's thumb. Minshew — 2. [Probably for quab.] A squab or young unfledged bird, hence, anything immature, unfinished, or crude. 'A scholar's fancy, a quab, 'tis nothing else, a very quab.' Ford. Qua-bird (kwā'berd), n. A kind of heron occurring in the Southern States of America; the night-heron.

Quacha (kwā'cha), n. In soot name as Quacha.

Quack (kwak), v. t. [A word formed from the sound, like D. kwacken, kwakern, G. quaken, Dan. kwake, to croak, to quack. Comp. Gr. krōs, the croak of a frog.] 1. To cry like the common domestic duck. — 2. To make vain and loud pretensions; to talk loudly and ostentatiously. 'To quack of universal cures.' Hudibras. — 3. To play the quack, to practice arts of quackery, as a boastful pretender to medical skill.

Hitherto I had only quacked with myself and the highest I conceived was our apothecary.

Quack (kwak), n. [From the verb.] 1. The cry of a duck. — 2. One who pretends to skill or knowledge which he does not possess; an empty pretender; a charlatan.

Physic had once alone the lofty style.
The well-known boast that ceased to raise a smile;
Now all the province of that tribe invade,
And we abound in quacks of every trade. Croft

Men that go mincing, grimacing, with plausible speech and brushed raiment, hollow within! quacks political, quacks scientific, academic. Carlyle

Specifically — 3. A boastful pretender to medical skill which he does not possess, a mountebank; a mere empiric; a tricking practitioner in physic. — BYM. Empiric, mountebank, charlatan.

Quack (kwak), s. Pertaining to or characterized by quackery, falsely pretending or falsely alleged to cure diseases, as, quack medicines, a quack doctor.

If all understood medicine, there would be none to take his quack medicine. Whately

Quackened (kwak'nd), p. and s. Almost choked. [Provincial.]

Quackery (kwak'er-i), n. The boastful pretensions or mean practices of a quack, particularly in medicine; empiricism, humbug, imposture.

Such quackery is unworthy of any person who pretends to learning. Ferris

Quackhood (kwak'hud), n. Quackery. [Rare.]

Like England will continue to worship new and ever new forms of Quackhood, and so, with what resemblances and reboundings matters little, go down to the Father of Quacks. Carlyle

Quackish (kwak'ish), a. Like a quack or charlatan, boasting of skill not possessed; exhibiting quackery, humbugging. 'The last quackish address of the National Assembly.' Burke

Quackism (kwak'izm), n. The practice of quackery.

In that same French Revolution alone, which burnt up so much what unmeasured masses of quackery were not fire to. Carlyle

Quackle (kwak'l), v. t. or i. [From sound made in choking.] To interrupt in breathing; to almost choke; to suffocate. [Provincial.]

Quack-salver (kwak'sal-ver), n. [D. kwak-salver, L.G. quack-salver, G. quack-salver, lit. a quack that deals in salves.] One who boasts of his skill in medicines and salves, or of the efficacy of his prescriptions, a charlatan; a quack. 'Mountebanks, quack-salvers, empiricks.' Burton

Quack-salving (kwak'sal-ving), a. Quack.

Yet, man, any quack-salving terms will serve for this purpose. Middleton

Quad (kwod), n. In printing, a colloquial contraction of Quadrat.

Quad (kwod), n. [Contr. for quadrangle.] The quadrangle or court, as of a college or jail; hence, a prison, a jail; quod.

The quad, as it was familiarly called, was a small quadrangle. Tristram

Quad, Quadr, a. [D. and L.G. kwad.] Evil, bad. Chaucer; Gower.

Quadrat (kwod'er), v. t. [L. quadrare, to square.] To quadrat; to square, to suit; to match.

The x doth not quadrat well with him, because it sounds harshly. History of Don Quixote, story.

Quader-sandstone, Quader-sandstein (kwā'der-sand-stōn, kwā'der-sand-stīn), n. [G. quader-sandstein, lit. square-sandstone.] A name given by the Germans to the principal rocks of their cretaceous system. The upper quader corresponds to our upper white chalk, and the lower to our upper greensand. The rock is soft, but well adapted for building purposes.

Quadra (kwod'ra), n. pl. Quadram (kwod're), [L., a square or plinth, a fillet.] In anat. (a) a square frame or border inclosing a bas-relief, but sometimes used to signify any frame or border. (b) The plinth of a podium. (c) One of the fillets above and below the scotia of the Ionic base.

Quadragesarius (kwod'ra-jē-nā'ti-an), n. [L. quadragesarius, from quadragesim, forty each, from quadragesima, forty.] Consisting of forty; forty years old.

Quadragesima (kwod'ra-jēn), n. [L. quadragesima, by forties.] A papal indulgence for forty days, a remission of the temporal punishment due to sin, corresponding to the forty days of the ancient canonical penance.

You have with much labour and some charge purchased to yourself so many quadragesimas or forty pardons, that is, you have bought off the penances of so many times forty days. Jer. Taylor

Quadragesima (kwod-ra-jor-ti-ma), n. [L. quadragesima, fortieth, from quadragesimus, forty, from quatuor, four.] Lent; so called because it consists of forty days.—Quadragesima Sunday, the first Sunday in Lent, and about the fortieth day before Easter.

Quadragesimal (kwod-ra-jor-ti-mal), a. (See above.) Connected with the number forty, especially with reference to the forty days of Lent, belonging to Lent, and in Lent.

This quadragesimal solemnity, in which, for the space of some weeks, the church has, in some select days, enjoined a total abstinence from flesh. Smith

Quadragesimal (kwod-ra-jor-ti-mal), a. [L. quadragesimalis, formerly made to the mother church on mid lent Sunday.]

Quadrangle (kwod-rang-gel), a. [L. quadrangulum, from quadrus = quatuor, four, and angulus, an angle.] 1. In geom., a quadrilateral figure, a plane figure having four sides, and consequently four angles. 2. A square or quadrangular court surrounded by buildings, as often seen in the buildings of a college, school, or the like, a quadrilateral area surrounded by buildings. 'The smooth green quadrangle and lofty towers of King Henry's College.' Forster

Quadrangular (kwod-rang-gel-er), a. Having the character of a quadrangle or four-angled figure, of a square shape, having four sides and four angles. 'A quadrangular table.' Spenser

Quadrangularly (kwod-rang-gel-er-li), adv. With four sides and four angles; in the form of a quadrangle.

Quadrans (kwod-rans), a. [L.] One fourth part of the Roman as; when the as was of full weight the quadrans was two uncias.

Quadrant (kwod-rant), a. [L. quadrans, quadrans, a fourth.] 1. The fourth part, the quarter.

In sixty-three years may be but sixteen days, omitting the intercalation of one day every fourth year, allowed for this quadrant or its hour supplementary. See T. Brown

2. The quarter of a circle; the arc of a circle containing 90°; also, the space or area included between this arc and two radii drawn from the centre to each extremity. 3. An instrument for measuring angular al-artificial globe, consisting of a slip of brass of the length of a quadrant of one of the great circles of the globe, and graduated. It is fitted to the meridian and movable round to all points of the horizon. It serves as a scale in measuring altitudes, azimuths, &c.—Quadrant electrometer, an electrometer invented by Sir W. Thomson, which enables small degrees of electricity to be measured with great precision.

Quadrantal (kwod-rant'al), a. Pertaining to a quadrant, included in the fourth part of a circle, as, a quadrantal space.—Quadrantal triangle, in trigon., a spherical triangle which has one side equal to a quadrant or 90°.

Quadrantal (kwod-rant'al), a. 1. A cube. [Rare.]—2. A cubical vessel used by the Romans, which contained the same quantity as the amphora (which see).

Quadrant (kwod-rant), a. [L. quadrans, squared. See QUADRATE.] 1. In printing, a piece of type—used for filling words, lines, the space on the sheet. Quadrants are of red, a quadrant, called also a Coat of Arms, and index, and are used superadded by modern use.

Quadrante (kwod-rant), a. [L. quadrans, squared, pp. of quadrus, quadratum, to make square, from quatuor, square, quatuor, four.] 1. Having four equal and parallel sides, square.

And working his teeth (he) found a host of caviars, with frozen, entire round, some straight, some quadrants. See T. Brown

2. Square, by being the product of a number multiplied into itself. 'Quadrato and cubical numbers.' See T. Brown.—3. Square, as typifying completeness or perfection; complete, even-balanced. 'A quadrato solid, who man.' H. More.—4. Sifted; sifted, applicable, correspondent.

The word quadrans, being applicable to a proper or improper commensurate, requires a general description quadrans to both. Mercur —Quadrans bone, in anat. a name given to the special bone by the intervention of which the lower jaw of birds and reptiles articulates with the skull, thus distinguishing them from mammals, in whom the lower jaw articulates directly. Called also Os Quadratum.

Quadrato (kwod-rat), a. 1. A square, a square or figure with four equal and parallel sides. 'A quadrato was the base.' Spenser. 'The power militant in mighty quadrato joined.' Alfon.—2. In astron., an aspect of the heavenly bodies, in which they are distant from each other ninety degrees, or the quarter of a circle, quadrato.

Quadrato (kwod-rat), a. [L. quadratus, pp. of quadrare, to square, quadratus, squared, to square. See the adjective.] To square, to suit, to correspond, to agree; to be accommodated; followed by with.

Armed's robe for his gentry cannot be compared to quadrato easily with the horse's pelt which have been made since his time. Addison Quadrato (kwod-rat), a. To trim a ship's gun on its carriage and its trunks, to adjust a gun for firing on a level range.

Quadrato (kwod-rat), a. [Fr. quadrato, from quadrare, to square.] 1. In alg., involving the square or second power of an unknown quantity, as, a quadrato equation, that is, an equation in which the unknown quantity is of two dimensions or raised to the second power; or one in which the highest power of the unknown quantity is a square.—2. In opt., dioptric, applied to the system that includes the square prism and related forms. Dana

Quadrato (kwod-rat), a. 1. A quadratic equation.—2. p. That branch of algebra which treats of quadratic equations. 'First simple quadratics . . . secondly, affected quadratics.' Barrow

Quadratrix (kwod-rat-riks), a. [L. quadratrix, to square.] Is given a curve by means of which we can find straight lines equal to the circumference of circles or other curves and their several parts; a curve employed for finding the quadrature of other curves; as, the quadratrix of Dinostratus, or of Torricellus.

Quadratura (kwod-rat-riks), a. [L. quadratura, from quadrare, quadratum, to square.] 1. In geom., the act of squaring; the reducing of a figure to a square. Thus the finding of a square which shall contain just as much area as a circle or a triangle, is the quadrature of that circle or triangle. smaller, in having a more delicate beak, shorter tail, no red space above the eye, longer wings, and no spur on the legs. The common quail (C. vulgaris) is a migratory bird, and is found in every country from the Cape of Good Hope to the North Cape. Its flesh is deemed excellent food. There are several other species, in appearance and habits not greatly differing from the common quail, as the Coromandel quail (C. testudo), the Australian quail (C. australis), the white-throated quail (C. torquata), the Chinese quail (C. exoniactoris), an elegant little species measuring only 4 inches in length, &c. The name quail is also given to some birds of other genera, as the Maryland quail (Orixy), the tufted quail (Lophortyx), &c. — 2.† A prostitute. [This sense arises from quails being supposed to be very amorous.]

Here's Agamemnon — an honest fellow enough, and one that loves quails. Shak.

Quail (kwál), s. t. To quail; to crush; to depress; to subdue.

My great heart
 Was never quailed before. Shak. & Fl.

Quail (kwál), s. t. [Fr. coailier, It. quagliare, L. coagulare, to curdle.] To curdle; to coagulate, as milk.

Being put into milk, . . . it keeps it from quailing and curdling. Holland.

Quail (kwál), n. [From O. Fr. quaille, Fr. coailie, It. quaglia, a quail, — names derived from the sound of its cry. Comp. D. kwakel, G. wackel, and Arner. coailie, a quail.] A common name of certain birds of the genus Coturnix, nearly allied to the partridges, from which they differ in being fully. 'Breathe his faults so quaintly.' Shak (d) ingeniously; with dexterity.

I quaintly stole a kiss. Gay.

Quaintness (kwáin'tness), n. The quality of being quaint; oddity and antiqueness.

The great obstacle to Chapman's translations being read is their unconquerable quaintness. Lamb.

Quair, Quaire (kwár), n. [O. Fr. quaiier, Mod. Fr. quaiier, from L. L. quaternum, from L. quatuor, four.] A book. Chaucer. 'Thou wilt quair of mater miserehille.' Sir D. Lindsay.

Quake (kwák), s. t. pret. & pp. quaked; ppr. quaking. [A. Sax. wacolan. Same root as quake; comp. Prov. G. quaken, to joggle, to waggle, to shake. See QUICK.] 1. To shake; to tremble; to be agitated with quick but short motions continually repeated; to shudder; as, to quake with fear or terror or with cold. Heb. xii. 21. — 2. To be shaken with more or less violent convulsions; as, the earth quakes; the mountains quake. Nah. i. 5. — 3. To shake, tremble, or move, as the earth under the feet, through want of solidity or firmness. 'Over quaking bogs and up precipitous ascents.' Macaulay.

Next Smedley divid; slow circles dimpled o'er
 The quaking mud that clod'd and op'd no more. Pope.

SYN. To shake, vibrate, tremble, quiver, shudder.

Quake (kwák), s. t. To frighten; to throw into agitation.

Where ladies shall be frightened,
 And, gladly quak'd, hear more. Shak.

Quake (kwák), n. A shake; a trembling; a shudder; a tremulous agitation.

Winds that up will cause a quake. Snelling.

Quake-breech (kwák-brésh), n. A coward.

Scowls, a hereticism, a faint-hearted fellow, a quake-breech, without boldness, spirit, wit, a poltroon. W. Shakespeare.

Quake-grass (kwák-gras), n. Same as Quaking-grass.

Quaker (kwák-er), n. 1. One that quakes; but usually applied to one of the religious sect called the Society of Friends. The name Quakers was given in reproach, but it was never adopted by the Society. See Society of Friends under FAITH.

Quakers (that like lanterns bear
 Their lights within them) will not swear. Hudibras.

2. A quaker-gun.

Quakeress (kwák-er-es), n. A female Quaker. Maryat.

Quaker-gun (kwák-er-gun), n. An imitation of a gun fashioned in wood placed in the port-hole of a ship or embrasure of a fortress for the purpose of deceiving the enemy; so called from its inoffensive diameter and its silence.

Quakeringly (kwák-er-ing-ly), adv. In a quaking manner; quakingly. Sir P. Sidney.

Quakerish (kwák-er-ish), adj. Relating to or resembling Quakers.

Quakerism (kwák-er-izm), n. The peculiar manners, tenets, or worship of the Quakers.

As a system, Quakerism must be regarded as essentially defective. It imitates life instead of consecrating it as a whole. Poetry, art, music, all the cheerful lesser lights of life, are blotted out in its soft death shadow. Macmillan's Mag.

But never pen did more quakingly perform his office. Sir P. Sidney.

Quaky (kwák-i), adj. Characterized by or prone to quaking; shaky; as, a quaky bog.

Qualifiable (kwól-i-f-a-bl), adj. Capable of being qualified; that may be abated or modified.

Qualification (kwól-i-f-a-kā'shon), n. [Fr. See QUALIFY.] 1. The act of qualifying, or

2. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

3. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

4. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

5. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

6. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

7. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

8. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

9. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

10. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

11. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

12. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

13. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

14. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

15. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

16. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

17. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

18. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

19. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

20. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

21. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

22. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

23. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

24. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

25. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

26. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

27. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

28. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

29. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

30. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

31. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

32. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

33. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

34. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

35. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

36. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

37. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

38. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

39. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

40. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

41. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

42. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

43. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

44. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

45. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

46. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

47. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

48. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

49. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

50. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

51. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

52. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

53. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

54. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

55. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

56. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

57. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

58. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

59. A person qualified for a particular office or duty.

60. A state of being qualified; a fitness for a particular office or duty.

the state of being qualified; adaptation; fitness.—2. That which qualifies or fits any person or thing for any use or purpose, as a place, an office, an employment; any natural or acquired quality, property or possession which secures a right to exercise any function, privilege, &c.; legal power; ability; as, the qualification of an elector; Necessary qualifications for preferment. Swift.

There is no qualification for government but virtue and wisdom, actual or presumptive. Burke.
In many cases, too, the choice of the government is practically limited to persons having the requisite professional qualifications. Sir G. C. Lewis.

3. A qualifying or extenuating circumstance; modification; restriction; limitation; hence, an abatement; a diminution; as, to assert something without any qualification. 'A qualification of a statement.' Raleigh.—4. Appausement.

Out of that will I cause these of Cyprus to mutiny; whose qualification shall come into no true taste again but by the displanting of Cassio. Shak.

Qualificative (kwol'i-kät-iv), a. Serving or having the power to qualify or modify.

Qualificative (kwol'i-f-kät-iv), n. That which serves to qualify, modify, or limit; a qualifying term, clause, or statement.

Adjectives or qualificatives disappear last, and everything disappears with them, because we cannot have an idea of a thing independently of its qualities. Dr. Forbes Winslow.

Qualificator (kwol'i-f-kät-er), n. In Rom. Cath. eccles. courts, an officer whose business it is to examine and prepare causes for trial.

Qualified (kwol'i-fid), p. and a. 1. Having a qualification; fitted by accomplishments or endowments; furnished with any legal power or capacity; as, a person sufficiently qualified to hold an appointment; a qualified elector.

That which ordinary men are fit for I am qualified in; and the best of me is diligence. Shak.

2. Accompanied with some limitation or modification; modified; limited; as, a qualified statement; qualified admiration.—3. Eccles. applied to a person enabled to hold two benefices.—Qualified fee, in law, a base fee. See under BASE.—Qualified oath, in Scots law, the oath of a party on a reference where circumstances are stated which must necessarily be taken as part of the oath, and which therefore qualify the admission or denial.—Qualified property, a limited right of ownership; as, (a) such right as a man has in wild animals which he has reclaimed. (b) Such right as a bailee has in the chattel transferred to him by the bailment.

Qualifiedly (kwol'i-fid-ly), adv. In a qualified manner; with qualification or limitation.

Qualifiedness (kwol'i-fid-nes), n. The state of being qualified or fitted.

Qualifier (kwol'i-fid-er), n. One who or that which qualifies; that which modifies, reduces, tempers, or restrains.

Qualify (kwol'i-f), v.t. pret. & pp. qualified; ppr. qualifying. [Fr. qualifier; L.L. qualificare—L. qualis, such, and facio, to make.] 1. To make such as is required; to fit for any place, office, or occupation; to furnish with the knowledge, skill, or other accomplishment necessary for a purpose; as, to qualify a man for a judge, for a minister of state or of the gospel, for a general or admiral.

I bequeath Mr. John Whiteway the sum of one hundred pounds in order to qualify him for a surgeon. Swift's Will.

2. To make legally capable; to furnish with legal power or capacity; as, to qualify persons for exercising the elective franchise.

He had qualified himself for municipal office by taking the oaths. Macaulay.

3. To narrow, limit, or modify; to restrict; to limit by exceptions; as, to qualify a statement or expression; to qualify the sense of words or phrases.—4. To moderate; to abate; to soften; to diminish; to assuage; as, to qualify the rigour of a statute.

I do not seek to quench your love's hot fire, But qualify the fire's extreme rage. Shak.

5. To modify the quality or strength of; to dilute or otherwise fit for taste; as, to qualify liquors.

(They) contrived to drink twopenny, qualified with brandy or whiskey. Sir W. Scott.

'You don't take water, of course?' said Bob Sawyer.—'Thank you,' replied Mr. Winkle. 'It's rather early: I should like to qualify it.' Dickens.

6. To temper; to regulate; to vary.

It hath no larynx nor throat to qualify the sound. Sir T. Browne.

Syn. To fit, equip, prepare, adapt, capacitate, modify, restrict, restrain, abate, soften, diminish, moderate, assuage, temper, reduce.

Qualify (kwol'i-f), v.i. 1. To take the necessary steps for rendering one's self capable of holding any office or enjoying any privilege; to establish a claim or right to exercise any function: followed by for; as, to qualify for a juror or for a justice of the peace; to qualify for a parliamentary elector.—2. In the United States, to swear to discharge the duties of an office; and hence, to make oath to any fact; as, I am ready to qualify to what I have asserted. Bartlett.

Qualitative (kwol'i-tät-iv), a. Pertaining to quality; estimable according to quality.—Qualitative analysis, in chem. see ANALYSIS.

Qualitied (kwol'i-tid), a. Disposed as to qualities or passions; furnished with qualities; endowed. 'He was well qualitied.' Chapman.

Quality (kwol'i-ti), n. [Fr. qualité, from L. qualitas, a quality or property, from qualis, of what sort, such.] 1. The condition of being such or such; nature, relatively considered; as, the quality of an action, in regard to right and wrong.

Other creatures have not judgment to examine the quality of that which is done by them. Hooker.

2. That which makes or helps to make anything such as it is; what is characteristic of a thing or person; a distinguishing property, characteristic, or attribute; a property; a trait. 'All the qualities that man loves woman for.' Shak. Qualities in metaphysics are often spoken of as natural or accidental; thus, figure and dimension are the natural qualities of solids; but a particular figure, as a cube, a square, or a sphere, is an accidental or adventitious quality. Primary or essential qualities are such as are inseparable from the substance, as thought from mind, or extension from matter. Secondary or non-essential qualities are such as we can separate in conception from the substance, as passionateness or mildness from mind, or heat or cold from matter. Sensible qualities are such as are perceptible to the senses, as the light of the sun, the colour of cloth, the taste of salt or sugar, &c.—Occult qualities. See OCCULT.—3. Specifically, virtue or particular power of producing certain effects; as, the qualities of plants or medicines. 'The burning quality of that fell poison.' Shak. 4. Particular condition; disposition; temper; moral characteristic, good or bad.

You must now speak Sir John Falstaff fair; Which swims against your stream of quality. Shak.
To-night we'll wander through the streets, and note The qualities of people. Shak.

5. Special or temporary character or part; assumed rank or position. 'In the quality of standers-by.' Swift. 'In quality of an antiquary.' Gray.—6. Comparative rank; condition in relation to others; as, people of every quality. 'Where qualities were level.' Shak.

We obtained acquaintance with many citizens not of the meanest quality. Bacon.

7. Superior rank; superiority of birth or station; high rank; as, persons of quality; ladies of quality. 'Gentlemen of blood and quality.' Shak.—The quality, persons of high rank, collectively.

I shall appear at the masquerade dressed up in my feathers, that the quality may see how pretty they will look in their travelling habits. Addison.

8. † A state of affairs producing certain effects; occasion; cause.

Know you the quality of Lord Timon's fury? Shak.

9. † Acquirement; accomplishment. 'Those qualities of horsemanship, dancing, and fencing.' Clarendon.

She hath more qualities than a water spaniel. Shak.

10. † Profession; occupation; hence, fraternity.

A man of such perfection As we in our quality much want. Shak.

For so his quality (of a musician) speaks him. Moxinger.

—Quality of estate, in law, the manner in which the enjoyment of an estate is to be exercised during the time which the right of enjoyment continues.

Quality-binding (kwol'i-ti-bind-ing), n. A kind of worsted tape used in Scotland for binding the borders of carpets and the like. Simmonds.

Qualm (kwäm), n. [A. Sax. cwealm, pestilence, destruction, death; cog. D. kwaalm, Dan. qualm, qualm, vapour, smoke; O.H.G.

qualm, death, ruin; from root of quell, quell.] 1. A sudden attack of illness; a turn of faintness or suffering; a throes or throbs of pain. 'Qualms of heart-sick agony.' Milton.

Some sudden qualm hath struck me at the heart And dimm'd mine eyes. Shak.

2. Especially, a sudden fit or seizure of sickness at the stomach; a sensation of nausea.

For who, without a qualm, have ever look'd? On lily garbage, though by Hooper cook'd? Rowe.

3. A scruple or twinge of conscience; compunction; uneasiness.

A qualm of conscience brings me back again. Dryden.
Many a qualm of care his rising hopes destroy. Boswell.

Qualme, † n. The cry of a raven. Chaucer.

Qualmire † (kwäl'mir), n. Quagmire, quavemire. 'Puddles and qualmires.' By Gardner.

Qualmish (kwäm'ish), a. [See QUALM.] Sick at the stomach; inclined to vomit; affected with nausea or sickly languor.

I am qualmish at the smell of leek. Shak.

Qualmishly (kwäm'ish-ly), adv. In a qualmish manner.

Qualmishness (kwäm'ish-nes), n. The state of being qualmish; nausea.

Quamash (kwäm'ash), n. The North American name of an eatable bulb (Camassia esculenta). These bulbs are much eaten by the Indians, and are prepared by baking in a hole dug in the ground, then pounding and drying them into cakes for future use. The plant from which they are derived belongs to the nat. order Liliaceae, and is nearly allied to the European squill. Written also Cammas.

Quamoclit (kwäm'ô-clit), n. [Gr. ὕψωμα, a kidney, and κλίω, climbing, sloping, low from κλίνω, to bend, to slope.] A genus of climbing ornamental plants, nat. order Convolvulaceae, chiefly found in the hot parts of America, but some species are indigenous both in India and China.

Quandang (kwan'dang), n. The edible fruit of Santalum acuminatum, a species of sandalwood. Treas. of Bot.

Quandary (kwon'da-ri or kwon-dä'ri), n. [Usually derived from Fr. Qu'en dirai-je? what can I say of it? Skeat, however, thinks that it is almost certainly a corruption of old wendrecht, an evil plight, peril, adversity; but the change of form and sound required seems too violent, especially in view of the fact that the original pronunciation would appear to have been with the accent on the second and not on the first syllable.] A state of difficulty or perplexity; a state of uncertainty or hesitation; a pickle; a predicament.

That much I fear forsaking of my diet Will bring me presently to that quandary I shall bid all adieu. Bacon & Fi.

Quandary (kwon'da-ri or kwon-dä'ri), a.t. pret. & pp. quanderied; ppr. quandarying. To put into a quandary; to bring into a state of uncertainty or difficulty.

Metinks I am quandary'd, like one going with a party to discover the enemy's camp, but had lost his guide upon the mountains. Ormsby.

Quannet (kwan'et), n. A kind of file, especially used for scraping zinc plates for the process denominated anastatic printing. Ure.

Quant (kwant), n. [Probably same as krat, a pole for leaping.] A pole, used by barge-men, with a flat board or cap at one end to prevent penetration of the mud; also, a jumping-pole, similarly fitted, used in fenny places. The name is also given to the cap.

Quantio (kwon'tik), n. [L. quantus, how much.] In math. a rational integral homogeneous function of two or more variables. They are classified according to their dimensions, as quadratic, cubic, quartic, quintic, &c., denoting quantics of the second, third, fourth, fifth, &c., degrees. They are further distinguished as binary, ternary, quaternary, &c., according as they contain two, three, four, &c., variables.

Quantification (kwon'ti-fik-ä'bon), n. The act or process of quantifying; the process by which anything is quantified; the act of determining the quantity or amount; more especially a term in logic; as, the quantification of the predicate.

Both of these words (quantification and quantify) have of late taken prominence in logic, it having been proposed to quantify the predicate as well as the subject of the propositions of a syllogism, i.e. instead of writing as at present

All A is B.
Some A is B, to write
All (or some) A is all (or some) B. Latham.

The quantification of the predicate belongs in part to Sir William Hamilton; viz., in its extension to negative propositions. De Quincoy.

Quantify (kwon'ti-fī), v.t. [pret. & pp. quantified; ppr. quantifying.] [Quantus, how much, and facio, to make.] To determine the quantity of; to modify or qualify with regard to quantity; to mark with the sign of quantity; more especially a term in logic.

Quantitative (kwon'ti-tā-tiv), a. [See QUANTIFY.] 1. Estimable according to quantity. Jer. Taylor.—2. Relating or having regard to quantity. 'Quantitative correlations.' H. Spencer.—Quantitative analysis, in chem. see ANALYSIS.

Quantitatively (kwon'ti-tā-tiv-ly), adv. In a quantitative manner.

Quantitatively (kwon'ti-tiv), a. Estimable according to quantity; quantitative. Sir K. Digby.

Quantitatively (kwon'ti-tiv-ly), adv. So as to be measured by quantity; quantitatively.

Quantity (kwon'ti-ti), n. [Fr. quantité, L. quantitas, quantity, extent, from quantus, how great, from quam, to what a degree.] 1. That property in virtue of which a thing is measurable; greatness; extent; measure; size.

Quantity ought to be defined, what may be measured. Those who have defined quantity to be whatever is capable of more or less, have given too wide a notion of it, which, it is apprehended, has led some persons to apply mathematical reasoning to subjects that do not admit of it. Pain and pleasure admit of various degrees, but who can pretend to measure them? There are some quantities which may be called proper, and others improper.

That property is quantity which is measured by its own kind, or which, of its own nature, is capable of being doubled or tripled, without taking in any quantity of a different kind as a measure of it. Improper quantity is that which cannot be measured by its own kind, but to which we assign a measure by the means of some proper quantity that is related to it. Thus velocity of motion, when we consider it by itself, cannot be measured (we measure it by the space passed in a given time). Rind.

Quantity is distinguished into continued and discrete. See under DISCRETE.—2. Any amount, bulk, or aggregate in a concrete sense; as, a quantity of earth, a quantity of water, a quantity of air, of light, of heat, of iron, of wood, of timber, of corn, of paper. But we do not say, a quantity of men, or of horses, or of houses; for as these are considered as separate individuals or beings, we call an assemblage of them, a number or multitude. Hence, often a large or considerable amount; a large bulk or sum. 'Warm anticorubical plants taken in quantities.' Arbutnot. 'The quantity of extensive and curious information which he had picked up during many months of desultory but not unprofitable study.' Macaulay.—3. † A portion or part, especially a small portion; anything very little or diminutive.

Away thou rag, thou quantity, thou remnant.

Have I not hideous death within my view.

Retaining but a quantity of life?

† Proportion; correspondent degree.

Things base and vile, holding no quantity.

Love can transpire to form and dignity.

5. In math. anything which can be multiplied, divided, or measured; anything to which mathematical processes are applicable. In algebra, quantities are known and unknown. Known quantities are usually represented by the first letters of the alphabet, as a, b, c, and unknown quantities are expressed by the last letters, x, y, z, &c. Letters thus used to represent quantities are themselves called quantities. A simple quantity is expressed by one term, as a, or abc; a compound is expressed by more terms than one, connected by the signs +, −, ×, or ÷, as a + b, or a − b + c. Quantities which have the sign + prefixed are called positive or affirmative; those which have the sign − prefixed are called negative. Similar quantities are such as consist of the same letters, and the same powers of the letters, as abc, − 3abc, + 5abc, − 9 abc. Unlike or dissimilar quantities are those which consist of different combinations of letters, as ab, ab², 3 abc, 4 xy, &c.—Constant and variable quantities. See under CONSTANT, a., and also Variation of constants under CONSTANT, n.—Real quantities, those which do not involve any operation impossible to be performed, such as the extraction of an even root of a negative quantity.—Imaginary quantity. See under IMAGINARY.—Rational and irrational quantities. See under RATIONAL.—6. In gram. the measure of a syllable or the time in which it is pronounced; the metrical value of syllables as regards length or weight in pronunciation; as, in Latin poetry quantity and not accent regulates the measure.

All composed in a metre of Catullus.

All in quantity careful of my motion.

7. In logic, a category, universal, or predicament; a general conception; also, the extent in which the subject of a proposition is taken, whether to stand for the whole, or only a part of its significates.

Another division of propositions is according to their quantity (or extent). If the predicate is said of the whole of the subject, the proposition is universal. If of part of it only, the proposition is particular (or partial); e.g., 'Britain is an island'; 'all tyrants are miserable'; 'no miser is rich,' are universal propositions, and their subjects are therefore said to be distributed, being understood to stand, each for the whole of its significates; but 'some islands are fertile'; 'all tyrants are not assassinated,' are particular, and their subjects consequently not distributed, being taken to stand for a part only of their significates.

—Quantity of estate, in law, the time during which the right of enjoyment of an estate continues.—Quantity of matter, in a body, is the measure arising from the joint consideration of its magnitude and density. Or the quantity of matter in a body is proportional to the magnitude and density of the body conjointly, and is measured by its absolute weight. See MASS.—Quantity of motion, in a body, is used synonymously with momentum to denote the product of the quantity of matter in the moving body by its velocity.—Quantity and tantity, terms employed by Mr. James Mill in his Elements of the Human Mind, as correlative; the Latin term, quantus, how much, being answered by tantus, so much.

Quantivalence (kwon-tiv'-a-lens), n. [L. quantus, how much, and valens, to have power, to be strong.] In chem. the combination of elements in multiple proportions. See extract.

The doctrine of quantivalence is, in strictness, only applicable in the case of gaseous elements and compounds, bodies whose molecular weight can be estimated by their vapours obeying Avogadro's law of volumes, viz., that the molecule of an element or compound is that weight of the body which occupies in the gaseous state the volume of hydrogen gas weighing a, the quantivalence of an element being determined by the number of atoms of hydrogen or of chlorine, or other distinctly monad element or radical, which it may be able to take up in this molecular volume. By an extension of this reasoning, we term potassium a monad and barium a dyad metal, because we find that they each form only one compound with chlorine, potassium combining with one atom and barium with two.

Quantum (kwon'tum), n. [L.] A quantity; an amount. 'Without authenticating this value or the quantum of the charge.' Burke.—Quantum meruit, as much as he has deserved. In law, an action grounded on a promise that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff for his service as much as he should deserve. Quantum sufficit or quantum suff., sufficient, as much as is needed.—Quantum valebat, as much as it was worth. In law, a phrase applied to an action now abolished on an implied promise to pay for goods sold as much as they were worth.

Quap, Quappe, Quapp, v.t. [See QUOB.] To quaver; to shake; to tremble. Chaucer.

Quaquaversal (kwā-kwa-ver'sal), a. [L. quaquā, on every side, and versus, inclined, from verto, to turn.] Inclined towards every side; facing all ways: in peol. a term applied to strata (or their inclination) inclined so as to face all sides.

Quart (kwor), n. A quarry. B. Jonson.

Quarantine (kwor-an-tin), n. [O. Fr. quarantaine, It. quarantina, a space of forty days, from quaranta, contr. from L. quadraginta, forty, from quatuor, four.] 1. Properly, the space of forty days: applied to the season of Lent.—2. The term, originally of forty days, but now of undetermined length, according to the exigencies of the case, during which a ship arriving in port and suspected of being infected with a malignant, contagious disease, is obliged to forbear all intercourse with the place where she arrives. Hence—3. Restraint of intercourse to which a ship is subjected, on the presumption that she may be infected, either for forty days or for any other limited term; as, to undergo quarantine.—4. In law, the period of forty days, during which the widow of a man dying seized of land had the privilege of remaining in her husband's capital mansion-house, and during which time her dower was to be assigned.

Quarantine (kwor-an-tin), v.t. pret. & pp. quarantined; ppr. quarantining. To put under quarantine; to prohibit from intercourse with the shore; to compel to remain at a distance from shore for forty days, or for other limited period, on account of real or supposed infection: applied to ships or to persons and goods.

Quarrel, n. A kind of arrow. Chaucer. See QUARREL.

Quarrellet, Quarrellet (kwor-el-et), n. [Dim. of quarrel, a bolt, &c.] A small square or diamond-shaped piece; a small losenge.

Some asked how pearls did grow and where?

Then spoke I to my girl,

To part her lips, and showed them there

The quarrellets of pearl.

Quarrel (kwor-el), n. [O.E. querrelle, from O. Fr. querelle, Fr. querelle, a quarrel, wrangling, from L. querela, a complaint, from queror, to complain (whence querulous). The root is the same as in cry.] 1. A brawl; a petty fight or scuffle; an angry dispute; a wrangle; an altercation; a feud.

Let no quarrel nor no brawl to come

Taint the condition of this present hour.

On open seas their quarrels they debate.

2. A breach of friendship or concord; open variance between parties.—3. Cause, occasion, or motive of dispute, contention, or debate; the basis or ground of being at variance with another; hence, the cause or side of a certain party at variance. 'To fight in quarrel of the house of Lancaster.' Shak.

He thought he had a good quarrel to attack him.

The king's quarrel is honourable.

Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just.

4. Objection; ill-will, or reason to complain; ground of objection.

I have no quarrel to the practice.

Herodias had a quarrel against him.

5. † Earnest desire or longing. Holland.—† In law, an action real or personal.—Syn. Brawl, broil, squabble, affray, feud, tumult, contest, dispute, altercation, contention.

Quarrel (kwor-el), v.t. pret. & pp. quarrelled; ppr. quarrelling. [Fr. quereller. See the noun.] 1. To dispute violently or with loud and angry words; to wrangle; to scuffle; to contend; to squabble: used of two persons or of a small number.—2. To fall out; to pick a quarrel; to get into hostilities; to come to loggerheads.

O sir, we quarrel in print, by the book.

Beasts called sociable, quarrel in hunger and lust.

Sir W. Temple.

3. To find fault; to cavil.

I will not quarrel with a slight mistake.

4. † To disagree; to be incongruous or incompatible; not to be in accordance in form or essence.

Some things arise of strange and quarrelling kind.

The forepart lion, and a snake behind.

Quarrel (kwor-el), v.t. 1. † To quarrel with. 'How that I had quarrell'd my brother purposely.' B. Jonson.—2. To find fault with; to challenge; to reprove, as a fault, error, and the like. [Scotch.]

I hope you will not quarrel the words, for they are all Virgil's.

Ruddiman.

3. To compel by a quarrel; as, to quarrel a man out of his estate or rights.

Quarrel (kwor-el), n. [O. Fr. quarrel, later quarreau, Mod. Fr. carreau, a bolt or quarrel, dim. of L. quadrum, something square, from quatuor, four.] 1. A bolt or dart to be shot from a cross-bow, or thrown from an engine or catapult, especially one with a square head and pyramidal point. 'Twang'd the string, outliew the quarrel long.' Faust.—2. A pane of glass, or a losenge-shaped pane of glass placed vertically, and used in lead casements; also, the opening in the window in which the pane is set.—3. A small paving stone or tile of the square or losenge form.—4. An instrument with a head shaped like that of the cross-bow bolt; as, (a) a glazier's diamond; (b) a kind of graver; (c) a stone-mason's chisel.

Quarrellingly (kwor-el-ing-ly), adv. In a quarrelling manner; contentiously.

Quarreller (kwor-el-er), n. One who quarrels, wrangles, or fights. 'He's a great quarreller.' Shak.

Quarrelous, Quarrelous (kwor-el-us), a. Apt or disposed to quarrel; petulant; easily provoked to enmity or contention. 'As quarrelous as the weasel.' Shak.

Quarrel.

The quantification of the predicate belongs in part to Sir William Hamilton; viz., in extension to negative propositions. De Quinc.

Quantify (kwon'ti-ſi), v. t. pret. & pp. quantified; ppr. quantifying. [L. quantus, how much, and facio, to make.] To determine the quantity of; to modify or qualify with regard to quantity; to mark with the sign of quantity; more especially a term in logic. Quantitative (kwon'ti-ti-ſi), a. (See QUANTITY.) 1. Estimable according to quantity. Jer. Taylor.—2. Relating or having regard to quantity. 'Quantitative correlations.' H. Spencer.—Quantitative analysis, in chem. see ANALYSIS.

Quantitatively (kwon'ti-ti-ſi-tiv-ly), adv. In a quantitative manner.

Quantitive (kwon'ti-tiv), a. Estimable according to quantity; quantitative. Sir E. Digby.

Quantitively (kwon'ti-tiv-ly), adv. So as to be measured by quantity; quantitatively.

Quantity (kwon'ti-ti), n. [Fr. quantité, L. quantitas, quantity, extent, from quantus, how great, from quam, to what a degree.] 1. That property in virtue of which a thing is measurable; greatness; extent; measure; size.

Quantity ought to be defined, what may be measured. Those who have defined quantity to be whatever is capable of more or less, have given too wide a notion of it, which, it is apprehended, has led some persons to apply mathematical reasoning to subjects that do not admit of it. Pain and pleasure admit of various degrees, but who can pretend to measure them? There are some quantities which may be called proper, and others improper.

That property is quantity which is measured by its own kind, or which, of its own nature, is capable of being doubled or tripled, without taking in any quantity of a different kind as a measure of it. Improper quantity is that which cannot be measured by its own kind, but to which we assign a measure by the means of some proper quantity that is related to it. Thus velocity of motion, when we consider it by itself, cannot be measured [we measure it by the space passed in a given time]. Rind.

Quantity is distinguished into continued and discrete. See under DISCRETE.—2. Any amount, bulk, or aggregate in a concrete sense; as, a quantity of earth, a quantity of water, a quantity of air, of light, of heat, of iron, of wood, of timber, of corn, of paper. But we do not say, a quantity of men, or of horses, or of houses; for as these are considered as separate individuals or beings, we call an assemblage of them, a number or multitude. Hence, often a large or considerable amount; a large bulk or sum. 'Warm antiscorbic plants taken in quantities.' Arbuthnot. 'The quantity of extensive and curious information which he had picked up during many months of desultory but not unprofitable study.' Macaulay.—3. A portion or part, especially a small portion; anything very little or diminutive.

Away thou rag, thou quantity, thou remnant.

Have I not hideous death within my view,

Retaining but a quantity of life?

4. Proportion; correspondent degree.

Things base and vile, holding no quantity,

Love can transpoise to form and dignity.

5. In math. anything which can be multiplied, divided, or measured; anything to which mathematical processes are applicable. In algebra, quantities are known and unknown. Known quantities are usually represented by the first letters of the alphabet, as a, b, c, and unknown quantities are expressed by the last letters, x, y, z, &c. Letters thus used to represent quantities are themselves called quantities. A simple quantity is expressed by one term, as +a, or -abc; a compound is expressed by more terms than one, connected by the signs + plus, or - minus, as a+b, or a-b+abc. Quantities which have the sign + prefixed are called positive or affirmative; those which have the sign - prefixed are called negative. Similar quantities are such as consist of the same letters, and the same powers of the letters, as abc, -3abc, +6abc, -9abc. Unlike or dissimilar quantities are those which consist of different combinations of letters, as ab, ab², 3abc, 4xyz, &c.—Constant and variable quantities. See under CONSTANT, a., and also Variation of constants under CONSTANT, a.—Real quantities, those which do not involve any operation impossible to be performed, such as the extraction of an even root of a negative quantity.—Imaginary quantity. See under IMAGINARY.—Rational and irrational quantities. See under RATIONAL.—6. In gram. the measure of a syllable or the time in which it is pronounced; the metrical value of syllables as regards length or weight in pronunciation; as, in Latin poetry quantity and not accent regulates the measure.

All composed in a metre of Catullus,
All in quantity careful of my motion.

7. In logic, a category, universal, or predicament; a general conception; also, the extent in which the subject of a proposition is taken, whether to stand for the whole, or only a part of its significates.

Another division of propositions is according to their quantity (or extent). If the predicate is said of the whole of the subject, the proposition is universal. If of part of it only, the proposition is particular (or partial); e.g., 'Britain is an island'; 'all tyrants are miserable'; 'no miser is rich,' are universal propositions, and their subjects are therefore said to be distributed, being understood to stand, each for the whole of its significates; but 'some islands are fertile'; 'all tyrants are not assassinated,' are particular, and their subjects consequently not distributed, being taken to stand for a part only of their significates. Whately.

—Quantity of estate, in law, the time during which the right of enjoyment of an estate continues.—Quantity of matter, in a body, is the measure arising from the joint consideration of its magnitude and density. Or the quantity of matter in a body is proportional to the magnitude and density of the body conjointly, and is measured by its absolute weight. See MASS.—Quantity of motion, in a body, is used synonymously with momentum to denote the product of the quantity of matter in the moving body by its velocity.—Quantity and tensity, terms employed by Mr. James Mill in his Elements of the Human Mind, as correlative; the Latin term, quantus, how much, being answered by tensus, so much.

Quantivalence (kwon-tiv'a-lens), n. [L. quantus, how much, and valere, to have power, to be strong.] In chem. the combination of elements in multiple proportions. See extract.

The doctrine of quantivalence is, in strictness, only applicable in the case of gaseous elements and compounds, bodies whose molecular weight can be estimated by their vapours obeying Avogadro's law of volumes, viz., that the molecule of an element or compound is that weight of the body which occupies in the gaseous state the volume of hydrogen gas weighing $\frac{1}{8}$ the quantivalence of an element being determined by the number of atoms of hydrogen or of chlorine, or other distinctly monad element or radical, which it may be able to take up in this molecular volume. By an extension of this reasoning, we find potassium a monad and barium a dyad metal, because we find that they each form only one compound with chlorine, potassium combining with one atom and barium with two. Nature.

Quantum (kwan'tum), n. [L.] A quantity; an amount. 'Without authenticating the value or the quantum of the charges.' Burke.—Quantum meruit, as much as he has deserved. In law an action grounded on a promise that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff for his service as much as he should deserve.—Quantum sufficit or quantum suff., sufficient; as much as is needed.

—Quantum valet, as much as it was worth. In law, a phrase applied to an action now abolished on an implied promise to pay for goods sold as much as they were worth.

Quap, Quappe, v. t. (See QUOB.) To quaver; to shake; to tremble. Chaucer.

Quaquaversal (kwá-kwa-vér'sal), a. [L. quaque, on every side, and versus, inclined, from verto, to turn.] Inclined towards every side; facing all ways: in geol. a term applied to strata (or their inclination) inclined so as to face all sides.

Quart (kwor), n. A quarry. B. Jonson.

Quarantine (kwor'an-tin), n. [O. Fr. quarantaine, It. quarantana, a space of forty days, from quaranta, contr. from L. quadraginta, forty, from quatuor, four.] 1. Properly, the space of forty days: applied to the season of Lent.—2. The term, originally of forty days, but now of undetermined length, according to the exigencies of the case, during which a ship arriving in port and suspected of being infected with a malignant, contagious disease, is obliged to forbear all intercourse with the place where she arrives. Hence—3. Restraint of intercourse to which a ship is subjected, on the presumption that she may be infected, either for forty days or for any other limited term; as, to undergo quarantine.—4. In law, the period of forty days, during which the widow of a man dying seized of land had the privilege of remaining in her husband's capital mansion-house, and during which time her dower was to be assigned.

Quarantine (kwor'an-tin), v. t. pret. & pp. quarantined; ppr. quarantining. To put under quarantine; to prohibit from intercourse with the shore; to compel to remain at a distance from shore for forty days, or for other limited period, on account of real or supposed infection: applied to ships or to persons and goods.

Quarrel, n. A kind of arrow. Chaucer. See QUARREL.

Quarrellet, Quarrellet (kwor'el-et), n. [Dim. of quarrel, a bolt, &c.] A small square or diamond-shaped piece; a small losenge.

Some asked how pearls did grow and where?

Then spoke I to my girl,

To part her lips, and showed them there

The quarrellets of pearl. Herrick.

Quarrel (kwor'el), n. [O. E. querrel, from O. Fr. querelle, Fr. querelle, a quarrel, wrangling, from L. querela, a complaint, from queror, to complain (whence querulous). The root is the same as in ery.] 1. A brawl; a petty fight or scuffle; an angry dispute; a wrangle; an altercation; a feud.

Let not quarrel nor no brawl to come

Taint the condition of this present hour.

On once seas their quarrels they debate. Dryden.

2. A breach of friendship or concord; open variance between parties.—3. Cause, occasion, or motive of dispute, contention, or debate; the basis or ground of being at variance with another; hence, the cause or side of a certain party at variance. 'To fight in quarrel of the house of Lancaster.' Shak.

He thought he had a good quarrel to attack him.

The king's quarrel is honourable. Shak.

Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just.

4. Objection; ill-will, or reason to complain; ground of objection.

I have no quarrel to the practice. Fillon.

Herodias had a quarrel against him. Mark vi. 19.

5. Earnest desire or longing. Holland.—6. In law, an action real or personal.—SYN. Brawl, broil, squabble, affray, feud, tumult, contest, dispute, altercation, contention.

Quarrel (kwor'el), v. t. pret. & pp. quarrelled; ppr. quarrelling. [Fr. quereller. See the noun.] 1. To dispute violently or with loud and angry words; to wrangle; to scuffle; to contend; to squabble: used of two persons or of a small number.—2. To fall out; to pick a quarrel; to get into hostilities; to come to loggerheads.

O sir, we quarrel in print, by the book. Shak.

Beasts called sociable, quarrel in hunger and lust.

Sir W. Temple.

3. To find fault; to cavil.

I will not quarrel with a slight mistake.

4. To disagree; to be incongruous or incompatible; not to be in accordance in form or essence.

Some things arise of strange and quarrelling kind,
The forepart lion, and a snake behind. Cowley.

Quarrel (kwor'el), v. t. 1. To quarrel with. 'How that I had quarrelled my brother purposely.' B. Jonson.—2. To find fault with; to challenge; to reprove, as a fault, error, and the like. [Scotch.]

I hope you will not quarrel the words, for they are all Virgil's.

3. To compel by a quarrel; as, to quarrel a man out of his estate or rights.

Quarrel (kwor'el), n. [O. Fr. quarrel, later quarreau, Mod. Fr. carreau, a bolt or quarrel, dim. of L. quadrum, something square, from quatuor, four.] 1. A bolt or dart to be shot from a cross-bow, or thrown from an engine or catapult, especially one with a square head and pyramidal point. 'Twang'd the string, out flew the quarrel long.' Fairfax.—2. A pane of glass, or a losenge-shaped pane of glass placed vertically, and used in lead casements; also, the opening in the window in which the pane is set.—3. A small paving stone or tile of the square or losenge form.—4. An instrument with a head shaped like that of the cross-bow bolt; as, (a) a glazier's diamond; (b) a kind of graver; (c) a stone-mason's chisel.

Quarrellingly (kwor'el-ing-ly), adv. In a quarrelling manner; contentiously.

Quarreller (kwor'el-er), n. One who quarrels, wrangles, or fights. 'He's a great quarreller.' Shak.

Quarrelous, Quarrelous (kwor'el-us), a. Apt or disposed to quarrel; petulantly easily provoked to enmity or contention. 'As quarrelous as the wasel.' Shak.

Quarrel.

Quarrelsome (kwor'el-sum), a. Apt to quarrel; given to brawls and contention; inclined to petty fighting; easily irritated or provoked to contest; irascible; choleric; petulant.

Quarrelsome (kwor'el-sum-li), adv. In a quarrelsome manner; with a quarrelsome temper; petulantly.

Quarrelsome (kwor'el-sum-nes), n. The state of being quarrelsome; disposition to engage in contention and brawls; petulance.

Quarriable (kwor'ia-bl), a. Capable of being quarried. 'The arable soil, the quarriable rock.' Emerson.

Quarrier (kwor'ier), n. One who works in a quarry; a quarryman.

Quarry (kwor'i), n. [O.E. quarre, from O.Fr. quarré, Mod. Fr. carrière, from L. quadrum, something square, from quatuor, four.] 1. A pane of glass. — 2. An arrow with a square head. See QUARREL. — 3. A small square paving flag or brick.

To be sure a stone floor was not the pleasantest to dance on, but then, most of the dancers had known what it was to enjoy a Christmas dance on kitchen quarries. George Eliot.

Quarry (kwor'i), a. Quadrate; square.

Quarry (kwor'i), n. [O.E. quarriere, quarere, from O.Fr. quarriere, Mod. Fr. carrière, a place where stones are hewn for building, lit. a place where they are squared, from L.L. quadraria, from L. quadrō, to square. See QUADRANT, &c.] 1. A place, cavern, or pit where stones are dug from the earth, or separated, as by blasting with gunpowder, from a large mass of rocks. The word mine is generally applied to the pit from which are taken metals and coals; from quarries are taken stones for building, as marble, freestone, slate, &c.

Quarry (kwor'i), v.t. pret. & pp. quarried; ppr. quarrying. To dig or take from a quarry; as, to quarry marble.

Quarry (kwor'i), n. [O.Fr. corée, Fr. curée, the portion of the beast given to the dogs, from L.L. corata, the heart and connected parts, the pluck, from L. cor, the heart.] 1. In hunting, (a) a part of the entrails of the beast taken given to the dogs. (b) A heap of game killed. — 2. Any animal pursued for prey; the game which a hawk or hound pursues; game; prey; object of chase or pursuit in general.

The day was now well advanced, and the Flemish captain had some fears, that notwithstanding his speed, the quarry had escaped him. Prescott.

Quarry (kwor'i), v.t. To prey upon, as a vulture or harpy.

Like the vulture that is day and night quarrying upon Prometheus's liver. L'Estrange.

Quarry (kwor'i), v.t. To provide with prey. Now I am bravely quarryed. Beau. & Fl.

Quarryman (kwor'i-man), n. A man who is occupied in quarrying stones.

Quarry-slayer (kwor'i-sláv), n. A slave compelled to work in a quarry.

Thou go not, like the quarry-slayer at night, Scourged to his dungeon. Bryant.

Quarry-water (kwor'i-wa-tér), n. The water contained in the substance of a stone newly quarried, but which becomes evaporated as the stone is exposed to the air, leaving in the minute pores the mineral matter it held in solution. Owing to the presence of this water, stones, whether stratified or unstratified, are more easily wrought when newly raised.

Quart (kwart), n. [Fr. quarte; lit. a fourth part, from L. quartus, the fourth, from quatuor, four.] 1. The fourth part or division; a quarter.

And Camber did possess the western quart. Spenser.

2. The fourth part of an imperial gallon; two pints, equal to 69.3185 cubic inches. The old English quart for wine and spirits contained 67.75 cubic inches; that for beer and ale, 70.5 cubic inches; and that for dry measure, 67.2 cubic inches nearly. — 3. A vessel containing the fourth of a gallon. — 4. (pron. kárk.) A sequence of four cards in the game of piquet.

Quartan (kwart'an), a. [L. quartanus, the fourth.] Designating the fourth; occurring every fourth day; as, a quartan ague or fever.

Quartan (kwart'an), n. 1. An intermitting ague that occurs every fourth day, or with intermissions of seventy-two hours. — 2. A measure containing the fourth part of some other measure.

Quartation (kwart-tá-shon), n. In chem. and metal. the alloying of one part of gold that is to be refined with three parts of silver, so that the gold shall constitute one quarter of the whole, and thereby have its particles so far separated as to be able to protect the other metals originally associated with it, such as silver, copper, lead, tin, &c., from the action of the nitric or sulphuric acid employed in the parting process. Ure.

Quart-bottle (kwart-bot'l), n. A bottle nominally containing the fourth part of a gallon, that is, two pints, but the ordinary quart-bottle of the shops seldom contains more than the sixth part of a gallon, and often even less.

Quart-d'ecu, Quardecu (kár-de-kü), n. An old French coin equal to the fourth part of a crown.

Sir, for a quart-d'ecu he will sell the fee-simple of his salvation. Shak.

Quarte (kárk), n. One of the four guards in fencing; a corresponding position of the body.

Quarter (kwart'ér), n. [O.Fr. quarter, quartier, Mod. Fr. quartier, a quarter, from L. quartarius, a fourth part, from quartus, fourth, from quatuor, four.] 1. One of four parts into which anything is divided; a fourth part or portion; as, a quarter of an hour; a quarter of a mile. Hence, in specific uses, (a) the fourth part of a hundred-weight, that is, 28 lbs., the hundredweight being equal to 112 lbs. (b) The fourth of a ton in weight, or 8 bushels of grain; also, the fourth part of a chaldron of coal. (c) In astron. the fourth part of the moon's period or monthly revolution; as, the first quarter after the change or full. (d) One of the four parts into which the horizon is supposed to be divided; one of the four cardinal points; as, the four quarters of the globe; but more widely, any region or point of the compass; as, from what quarter does the wind blow? people thronged into the Continent from all quarters. (e) A particular region of a town, city, or country; a district; a locality; as, the Latin quarter of Paris; the Jews' quarter in Florence. (f) In navy, the fourth part of the distance from one point on the compass card to another, being the fourth of 11° 15', that is, about 3° 49'. Called also Quarter-point. (g) The fourth part of the year; specifically, in schools, the fourth part of the teaching period of the year, which is generally ten or eleven weeks. (h) One-fourth part of the carcass of a quadruped, including a limb. (i) In her. one of the divisions of a shield when it is divided into four portions by horizontal and perpendicular lines meeting in the fesse point; an ordinary occupying one-fourth of the field, and placed (unless otherwise directed) in the dexter chief, as shown in the cut. (j) The piece of leather in a shoe which forms the side from the heel to the vamp. (k) Naut. the part of a vessel's side which lies towards the stern, or the part between the aftmost end of the main-chains and the sides of the stern, where it is terminated by the quarter-plates. (l) In farriery, that part of a horse's foot between the toe and the heel, being the side of the coffin; a false-quarter is a cleft in the hoof extending from the coronet to the shoe, or from top to bottom. When for any disorder one of the quarters is cut the horse is said to be quarter-cut. (m) In arch. a square panel inclosing a quatrefoil or other ornament; also, an upright post in partitions to which the laths are nailed. — 2. Proper position; specific place; assigned or allotted position; special location.

Swift to their several quarters hasted then The cumbrous elements. Milton.

Hence, specifically, (a) naut. the post allotted to the officers and men at the commencement of an engagement; generally in the plural. (b) Place of lodging; temporary residence; shelter; entertainment: usually in the plural.

It was high time to shift my quarters. Spectator.

(c) A station or encampment occupied by troops; place of lodgment for officers and men: usually in the plural; as, they went into winter quarters. See also HEADQUARTERS.

Thou canst defend as well as get, And never had our quarter beat up yet. Cowley.

The quarters of the several chiefs they showed. Dryden.

(d) In war, the sparing of the life of a vanquished enemy; hence, in a wider sense, refraining from pushing one's advantage to the destruction of the weaker party; merciful treatment by the conquerors or stronger party. [Note. The expression seems to be derived from the use of the word to designate the lodging of the victorious warrior, to give or show quarter to the vanquished being to send him to his captor's quarters for liberation, ransom, or slavery. Some authorities say, however, that the term originated from a custom of the Dutch and Spaniards, who accepted as the ransom of an officer or soldier a quarter of his pay for a certain period.]

He magnified his own clemency, now that they were at his mercy, to offer them quarters for their lives, if they gave up the castle. Clarendon.

When the cocks and lambs lie at the mercy of men and wolves, they must never expect better quarters. Sir R. L'Estrange.

—On the quarter (naut.), in the direction of a point in the horizon considerably about the beam, but not in the direction of the stern.

Quarter (kwart'ér), v.t. 1. To divide into four equal parts.

A thought which, quartered, hath but one part within. Shak.

2. To divide; to separate into parts; to cut to pieces. Shak. — 3. To divide into distinct regions or compartments.

Then sailors quartered heaven and found a name For every fixed and every wandering star. Dryden.

4. To furnish with lodgings, shelter, or entertainment; to supply with temporary means of living; especially, to find lodgings and food for; as, to quarter soldiers on the inhabitants.

There came a young noble, a warrior who had never seen war, glittering with gewgaws. He was quartered in the town where the mistress of his heart, and who was soon to share my life and my fortune resided. Disraeli.

5.1 To diet; to feed.

It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal, and is in the Scotch statutes called the testimonial of the great seal. Gifts of lands from the crown pass this seal in certain cases. Bell.

Quarter-sessions (kwar'tér-seesh'onz), n. pl. 1. In England, a general court of criminal jurisprudence held quarterly by the justices of the peace in counties, and by the recorder in boroughs. The jurisdiction of these courts, originally confined to matters touching breaches of the peace, has been gradually extended to the smaller misdemeanours and felonies, but with many exceptions. There is also an extensive jurisdiction in matters relating to the settlement of the poor, highways, vagrancy, bastardy, &c., in most of which cases an appeal lies to the higher courts. — 2. In Scotland, a court held by the justices of the peace four times a year at the county towns. These courts have the power of reviewing the sentences pronounced at the special and petty sessions when the sentence is of a nature subject to review. Such cases as fall to be tried by the English courts of quarter-sessions are chiefly disposed of in Scotland in the sheriff courts of the county.

Quarter-staff (kwar'tér-staf), n. pl. Quarter-staves (kwar'tér-stáiv), n. An old English weapon formed of a stout pole about 6½ feet long, generally loaded with iron at both ends. It was grasped by one hand in the middle, and by the other between the middle and the end. In the attack the latter hand shifted from one quarter of the staff to the other, giving the weapon a rapid circular motion, which brought the loaded ends on the adversary at unexpected points.

They had short swords by their sides, and quarter-staves in their hands. . . . The miller, on the other hand, holding his quarter-staff by the middle, and making it flourish round his head. . . . exclaimed boastfully, 'Come on, churl, an thou darrest!' Sir W. Scott.

Quarter-stanchion (kwar'tér-stan-shon), n. Naut. a strong stanchion in the quarters of a square-sterned vessel, one of which forms the extreme boundary of the stern on either side.

tain Christians who, in accordance with the custom of the Jews, celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the paschal moon, whether that day fell on a sabbath or not. This practice was finally condemned by the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. Called also Quatredecimani and Paschites.

Quart-pot (kwart'pôt), n. A pot or drinking vessel containing a quart.

Many a time, when I have been dry, and bravely marching, it (a helmet) hath served me instead of a quart-pot to drink in. Shak.

Quartrain (kwat'rân), n. Same as Quartrian.

Quartridge (kwat'rîj), n. Quarterly allowance; quarterage. Swift.

Quartz (kwarts), n. [From G. quartz, quartz, quartz.] A name given to numerous varieties of the native oxide of silicon, called also silicic acid. Quartz embraces a large number of varieties. When pure its composition is expressed by the formula SiO_2 . It occurs both crystallized and massive, and in both states is most abundantly diffused throughout nature, and is especially one of the constituents of granite and the older rocks. When crystallized it generally occurs in hexagonal prisma, terminated by hexagonal pyramids. It scratches glass readily, gives fire with steel, becomes positively electrical by friction, and two pieces when rubbed together become luminous in the dark. The colours are various, as white or milky, gray, reddish, yellowish or brownish, purple, blue, green. When pure and crystalline in appearance it is known as rock-crystal. Hornstone, amethyst, iderite, agate, aventurine, flint, opal, chalcedony, onyx, sardonyx, and jasper, are all varieties of this mineral. Quartz veins are often found in metamorphic rocks, and frequently contain rich deposits of gold.

Quartz-crusher (kwarts'krush-ér), n. A machine for pulverizing quartz, so as to facilitate the extraction of gold.

Quartziferous (kwart-sif-ér-us), n. [Quartz, and L. fero, to bear.] Consisting of quartz, or chiefly of quartz.

There we have the well-known quartz porphyry of Botzen, and there, too, we have quartziferous lavas peculiarly interesting to the petrologist as examples of rocks which exhibit the very rare association of a plagioclasic felspar with free quartz. Nineteenth Century.

Quartzite (kwarts'it), n. A rock formed of granular quartz; quartz-rock.

Quartz-mill (kwarts'mîl), n. A mill for crushing quartz.

Quartzoid (kwarts'oid), n. [Quartz, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] In crystal, a double six-sided pyramid, represented by uniting two six-sided single pyramids base to base.

Quartzose (kwarts'ôse), a. Containing quartz; composed of quartz; resembling quartz, or having the properties of quartz. Written also Quartzuous.

Quartz-rock (kwarts'rok), n. A stratified granular-crystalline, metamorphic rock, consisting entirely, or almost entirely, of quartz. It is generally of a grayish, or pinkish-gray, colour from a slight trace of iron.

Quartz-sinter (kwarts'sîn-tér), n. Siliceous sinter. See SINTER.

Quartzty (kwarts'ti), a. Containing or abounding in quartz; pertaining to quartz; partaking of the nature or qualities of quartz; resembling quartz.

Quas (kwas), n. See QUASS.

Quaschi (kwas'chi), n. See QUASSIA.

Quash (kwosh), v.t. [O.Fr. quasser, Fr. casser, from L. quassare, to shake, shatter, shiver; intens. from quatio, quassum, to shake, to break.] 1. To beat down or beat in pieces; to crush.

Against sharp rocks, like reeling vessels quash'd, Though huge as mountains are in pieces dash'd. Walter.

2. To crush; to subdue; to put down summarily; to quell; to extinguish; to put an end to; as, to quash a rebellion.

Our joys are quashed, our hopes are blasted. Cotton.

3. In law, to abate, annul, overthrow, or make void from insufficiency, or for other cause; as, to quash an indictment.

Quash (kwosh), v.t. To be shaken with a noise; to make the noise of water when pressed or shaken; to squash. 'Quashing and shaking.' Ray.

Quash (kwosh), n. A species of Cucurbita; a squash. See SQUASH.

Quasi (kwá'si), [L.] As if; in a manner. This word is sometimes used before English words to express resemblance. It generally implies that what it qualifies is in some degree fictitious or unreal, or only has certain features of what it professes to be; as, a quasi-argument, that which resembles or is used as an argument; a quasi-historical account.—Quasi contract, in law, an act which has not the strict form of a contract, but has yet the effect of it.—Quasi crime, or Quasi delict, the action of one doing damage or evil involuntarily.—Quasi entail, an estate pur autre vie granted, not only to a man and his heirs, but to a man and the heirs of his body; the interest so granted not being properly an estate-tail.

Quasi-fee (kwá'si-fé), n. In law, an estate gained by wrong. Wharton.

Quasimodo (kwás-i-mô'dô), [L.] In Rom. Cath. calendar, a term applied to the first Sunday after Easter: so called because the introit for that day begins with the words 'Quasi modo, genti infantes.'

Quasi-radiate (kwá-si-rá'di-át), a. In bot. slightly radiate: a term applied to the heads of some composites, whose ray-florets are small and inconspicuous.

Quasi-realty (kwá-si-ré'al-ti), n. In law, things which are fixed in contemplation of law to realty but movable in themselves, as heir-looms, title-deeds, court-rolls, &c. Wharton.

Quasi-tenant (kwá-si-tén'ant), n. In law, an undertenant who is in possession at the determination of an original lease, and is permitted by the reversioner to hold over. Wharton.

Quasi-trustee (kwá-si-trus-té'), n. In law, a person who reaps a benefit from a breach of trust and so becomes answerable as a trustee. Wharton.

Quasje (kwas'jé), n. The native name of the brown coat or coatimondi (Nasua narica), called also Narica. It is a very amusing little animal, and possesses singular powers of nose and limb. Called also Quaschi. See COATI, NASUA. J. G. Wood.

Quass (kwas), n. A thin, sour, fermented liquor, made by pouring warm water on rye or barley meal, and drunk by the peasantry of Russia. Written also Quas.

Quassation (kwas'sáshon), n. [L. quassatio, quassationis, from quasso, to shake. See QUASH.] The act of shaking; concussion; the state of being shaken. 'Continual concussions, threshing, and quassations.' Gayton.

Quassia (kwás'i-a), n. (From Quassy, the name of a negro who first made known the medicinal virtues of one of the species.) A genus of South American tropical plants, consisting of trees, nat. order Simarubaceae. The wood of two species is known in commerce by the name of Quassia; Q. amara, a native of Panama, Venezuela, Guiana, and Northern Brazil, a small tree with handsome crimson flowers; and Q. excoelea (Pterocarpus excoelea, Lindley), a native of Jamaica. The latter furnishes the lignum quassia of the British Pharmacopoeia: it is a tree 50 to 60 feet high, something like an ash, having inconspicuous greenish flowers, and black shining drupes the size of a pea. Both kinds are imported in billets, and are inodorous, but intensely bitter, especially the Jamaica quassia. The active principle has been termed quassin or quassite, a neutral body readily soluble in alcohol. Quassia is a pure and simple bitter, possessing marked tonic properties. It is generally given in the form of infusion. An infusion of quassia sweetened with sugar is useful to destroy flies. Q. excoelea was formerly substituted by some brewers for hops, but is now prohibited under severe penalties.

Quassin, Quassine (kwás'in), n. (Probably $C_{10}H_{12}O_4$.) The bitter principle of quassia (Quassia or Pterocarpus excoelea). This substance crystallizes from aqueous solutions in very small white prisma. Its taste is intensely bitter, but it is destitute of smell. It is scarcely soluble in common ether, slightly soluble in water, and more soluble in alcohol. Written also Quassina.

Quassite (kwás'it), n. Same as Quassin.

Quat (kwot), n. A pustule or pimple.

I have rubb'd this young quat almost to the sense, and he grows angry. Shak.

Quat (kwot), v.t. pret. & pp. quatted; ppr. quattuing. [A form of quit, quits, quicet.] To satiate.

To the stomach quatted with dainties all delicate seeme quassie. Livy.

Quater-cousin, Quatre-cousin (kwá'tér-kuz-n, kwá'tr-kuz-n), n. (Fr. quatre, four, and cousin.) A cousin within the first four degrees of kindred.

Quaterfoil (kwá'tér-fôil), Same as Quatrefoil.

Quatern (kwá'térn), a. [L. quaternus, four each, from quatuor, four.] Consisting of four; fourfold; growing by fours; as, quatern leaves.

Quaternary (kwá'tér-na-ri), n. [L. quaternarius, from quatuor, four.] The number four.

The objections against the quaternary of elements and ternary of principles, needed not to be opposed so much against the doctrines themselves. Macle.

Quaternary (kwá'tér-na-ri), a. 1. Consisting of four.—2. In geol. a term applied to the strata above the tertiary. Called also Post-tertiary (which see).

The contemporaneity of man with those species of animals which last became extinct, his contemporaneity with the reindeer as an indigenous animal in France is amply, positively, and irrevocably proved by the discovery of the products of human industry abundantly mixed with the remains of these animals, which have now become extinct or have emigrated, in undisturbed quaternary beds and in the midst of cave deposits which have never been disturbed. Büchner, translated by Dollfus.

3. In chem. a term applied to those compounds which contain four elements, as gum, fibrin, &c.

Quaternate (kwá'tér-nát), a. Consisting of four.—Quaternate leaf, one that consists of four leaflets.

Quaternate-pinnate (kwá'tér-nát-pín'át), a. In bot. pinnate, with the pinnae arranged in four.

Quaternion (kwá'tér-ni-on), n. [L. quaternio, from quatuor, four.] 1. A set, group, or body of four: applied to persons or things. Milton.

He put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers. Acts xii. 4.

2. A word of four syllables; a quadrisyllable. 'The triads and quaternions with which he loaded his speech.' Sir W. Scott.—3. A term for a quantity employed in a method of mathematical investigation discovered and developed by Sir W. R. Hamilton. See extract.

A Quaternion is the quotient of two vectors, or of two directed right lines in space, considered as depending on a system of Four Geometrical Elements; and as expressible by an algebraical symbol of Quaternionical Form. The science, or Calculus, of Quaternions, is a new mathematical method wherein the foregoing conception of a quaternion is unfolded, and symbolically expressed, and is applied to various classes of algebraical, geometrical, and physical questions, so as to discover many new theorems, and to arrive at the solution of many difficult problems. Sir W. R. Hamilton.

Quaternion (kwá'tér-ni-on), v.t. To divide into quaternions, files, or companies.

The angels themselves are distinguished, and quaternioned into their celestial primecords and serapies. Milton.

Quince (kwí'st), n. In chem. a salt of quinic acid.

Quince (kwí'st), n. [O.E. quince, from Fr. quince, a kind of quince, from quince, a quince, from L. quince, quince, from quince, a quince, from the north coast of Crete.] The fruit of the Cydonia vulgaris, nat. order Rosaceae. The quince-tree, which is supposed to be a native of Western Asia, is now cultivated throughout Europe, and in many parts of the United States, for its handsome golden yellow fruit, which, though hard and austere when plucked from the tree, becomes excellent when boiled and eaten with sugar, or preserved in syrup, or made into marmalade. Quinces, when mixed with other fruit, in cookery, communicate a very pleasant flavour. Bengal quince. See under SOLE.

Quince (kwí'st) vulgaris.

Quince-seed (kwí'st-sí), n. The seeds of the quince, used for making a gummy substance for imparting stiffness and gloss to the hair, as also a mucilage for chopped lips. Simmonds.

Quince-tree (kwí'st-trí), n. The Cydonia vulgaris. See QUINCE.

Quince-wine (kwí'st-wín), n. A pleasant beverage made of the fermented juice of the quince.

Quince (kwí'st), s.t. (Probably a nasalized form of quill, to stir. See QUILL.) To move, stir, winnow, or scour.

No part of all this rumour shall be able to dash to quince. Spenser.

Quincunial (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunial, from quincunial.] Having the form of a quincunial. — Quincunial disposition. In bot. a term applied when there are five petals—two outer, two inner, and one covering the latter by one of its sides.

Quincunial (kwín-kun'shál), adv. In a quincunial manner or order. Sir T. Brown.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. compounded of quincunx, five, and quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] An arrangement of five objects in a square, one at each corner and one in the middle; especially, an arrangement, as of trees, in such squares, thus:

continuously. A collection of trees in such squares forms a regular grove or wood, presenting parallel rows or alleys in different directions, according to the spectator's position. — 2. In bot. a quincunial arrangement of the petals of a flower. — 3. In astr., the position of planets when distant from each other five signs or 150°.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunx, five, or quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] In geom. a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunx, five, or quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] In geom. a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunx, five, or quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] In geom. a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunx, five, or quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] In geom. a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

Quincunx (kwín-kun'shál), n. [L. quincunx, five, or quincunx, a square, or a five-sided figure.] In geom. a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

formation of either of these bases. It is very bitter, possesses febrifugal properties, and turns the plane of polarisation to the right.

Quinidine (kwín'dín), n. ($C_{20}H_{24}N_2O_4$) A base isomeric with quinine and occurring associated with it in some cinchona barks. It crystallises in large transparent prisms, almost insoluble in water, but tolerably so in alcohol. It neutralises acids, and forms salts with them, which much resemble the corresponding quinine salts, but crystallise more easily. The salts are febrifugal.

Quinine (kwín'ín), n. [Indian quina, quina, bark.] A most important vegetable alkali, obtained from the bark of several trees of the genus Cinchona (which see). Its composition is expressed by the formula $C_{20}H_{24}N_2O_4$. It is colourless, inodorous, and extremely bitter. With acids it forms crystallisable salts, the most important of which is the sulphate, so extensively used in medicine, as a febrifuge and tonic.

Quininium (kwín'ín'm), n. The same as Cinchoninum.

Quina (kwí-nó's), n. A South American plant (Chenopodium Quinoa), of which there are two cultivated varieties, one yielding white seeds, and sometimes called pettioria, the other red. The white seeds under the same name (quinoa) are extensively used in Chili and Peru as an article of food in the form of porridge, cakes, &c. A preparation of them, under the name of oroseque, is a favourite dish with the ladies of Lima. The seeds of the other variety, red quina, are used medicinally as an application for sores and bruises.

Quinoline (kwín'ólín), n. (C_8H_7N) A liquid volatile base, formed artificially by distilling quinine, cinchonine, or strychnine, along with caustic potash. It is a very bitter, and strongly alkaline, and forms crystallisable salts with acids. Quinoline is present in coal tar and may be treated so as to yield three colouring matters—a green, a blue, and a violet. Written also Quinoline.

Quinologist (kwí-nól'ó-jist), n. One versed in quinology.

Quinology (kwí-nól'ó-jí), n. The sciences which treat of quinine and other febrifuge alkaloids.

Quinone (kwín'ón), n. See QUINONE.

Quinquagesima (kwín-kwá-jé-sí-má), n. [L. quingagesimus, Sunday, so called as being about the fiftieth day before Easter.] Shrove Sunday.

Quinquangular (kwín-kwáng-gú-lér), a. [L. quingulus, five, and angulus, angle.] Having five angles or corners.

A flatish ring of iron, generally from 8½ to 9½ inches in external diameter, and between 1 and 2 inches in breadth. It is convex on the upper side and slightly concave on the under side, so that the outer edge curves downwards, and is sharp enough to cut into soft ground. — 2. pl. The game played with such rings, in the following manner. Two pins, called hobs, are driven part of their length into the ground from 18 to 24 yards apart; and the players, who are divided into two sides, stand beside one hob, and in regular succession throw their quoits (of which each player has two) as near the other hob as they can, giving the quoit an upward and forward pitch with the hand and arm, and at same time giving it a whirling motion so as to make it cut into the ground. The side who has the quoit nearest the hob counts a point towards game, or if the quoit is thrown so as to surround the hob, it counts two. The game only slightly resembles the ancient one of throwing the discus, which has, however, been often translated by this English word.

Quoit (koi), v. t. and i. t. 1. To throw. 'Quoit him down, Bardolph.' Shak. — 2. To throw quoits; to play at quoits. In the extract the allusion is to the discus throwing of the ancients.

Quo warrant (kw'ot war-ran-tis), [L. quo, ablative of quis, who, which, and L. war-rantus, a guarantee, E. warrant.] In law, a writ formerly issued from the Court of Queen's Bench which called upon a person or body of persons to show by what warrant they exercised any public office, privilege, franchise, or liberty. The writ itself is fallen into disuse, but the name and is attained by the attorney-general filing an information in the nature of a quo warrant.

It was the knowledge of this that produced the Corporation Act soon after the Restoration, to exclude the Presbyterians, and the more violent measures of quo warrant at the end of Charles's reign.
Hallam.

R.

R is the eighteenth letter of the English alphabet, classed as a liquid and semi-vowel. In the pronunciation of Englishmen generally it represents two somewhat different sounds. The one heard at the beginning of words and syllables, and when it is preceded by a consonant, is produced by an expulsion of vocalised breath, the tongue almost touching the palate behind the front teeth, with a slightly tremulous motion; the other, less decidedly consonantal, heard at the end of words and syllables, and when it is followed by a consonant, formed by a vibration of the lower part of the tongue, near the roof, against the soft palate. In the pronunciation of many English speakers, r, followed by a consonant at the end of a syllable, is scarcely heard as a separate sound, having merely the effect of lengthening the preceding vowel: when it is itself final, as in bear, door, their, &c., it becomes a vowel rather than a consonant. In some of the dialects, and notably in Scotch, no such pronunciations of r are heard, the letter having always the same sound, and being uttered with a very strong vibration of the point of the tongue, much as in French or German, though less guttural. Among the Romans r was called 'the dog's letter' (littera canina), from its sound being compared to the snarling of a dog; as Ben Jonson says, 'R is the dog's letter and hurrueth in the sound.' R has very close affinities with l, and its interchange with that consonant is common. (See L.) It is also closely allied to s (with the s-sound); and thus we find the latter changing to r, as exemplified by A. Sax. læn, E. iron, A. Sax. fæddan, E. freeze and adjective frown, A. Sax. cedan, to choose, coren, chosen, Goth. ansao = E. ear (L. auris). It has intruded itself into some words to which it does not pro-

Rabbinate, Rabbinitical (rab-bi'nal, rab-bi'nal), n. Pertaining to the rabbins, or to their opinions, learning, and language. The term rabbinate has been given to all the Jewish writings composed after the Christian era.

We will not buy your rabbinate fennel; we have One that calls us to buy of him pure gold tried in the fire. Alfred.

Rabbinate (rab-bi'nal), n. The language or dialect of the rabbins; the later Hebrew Rabbinitism (rab-bi'nal-izm), n. A rabbinic expression or phraseology, a peculiarity of the language of the rabbins.

Rabbinate (rab'bin-izm), n. Among the Jews, one who adhered to the Talmud and the traditions of the rabbins, in opposition to the Caraites, who rejected the traditions.

Those who stood up for the Talmud and its traditions were chiefly the rabbins and their followers, from whence the party had the name of rabbinites. Southey.

Rabbinate (rab'bin-izm), n. The same as Rabbinate.

Rabbit (rab'bit), n. [O.E. rebbot, O.D. rebbes, rebbes, a rabbit. Connections doubtful.] A small rodent mammal, of the family Leporidae (hares and rabbits), the Lepus cuniculus, which feeds on grass or other herbage, and burrows in the earth. The rabbit is of smaller size than the hare, and has shorter ears and hinder legs. In its wild state the fur is of a brown colour, but when domesticated the colours vary much, being white, pied, ash-coloured, black, &c. Rabbits, when wild, are reared in warrens, and when tame in hutches. They are extremely prolific, producing young seven times a year, the litter usually being eight. Their fur is used in the manufacture of hats, and their flesh is more juicy than that of the hare. - Welsh rabbit, cheese melted by the action of heat and mixed with a little cream, or toasted and laid in thin slices on slices of bread which have been toasted and buttered. Popularly supposed to be a corruption of Welsh rabbit, but see extract.

Welsh rabbit is a genuine slang term, belonging to a large group which describe in the most humorous way the special dish or product or peculiarity of a particular district. For example, see Fitter how in a cell, a hard lawe duck is a baked sheep's head, leas, an magistrate or Welsh apert are cod herrings, Irish apert or Irish apert are potatoes, Irish apert are Irish apert.

oner was laid on his back upon the floor, with his wrists and ankles attached by cords to two rollers at the end of the frame. These rollers were moved in opposite directions by levers till the body rose to a level with the frame, questions were then put, and if the answers were not deemed satisfactory, the sufferer was gradually stretched till the bones started from their sockets. It was formerly much used by civil authorities in cases of traitors and conspirators, and by the members of the Inquisition, for extorting a recantation from imputed heretical opinions. The rack was introduced into England in the reign of Henry VI., and although declared by competent judges to be contrary to English law, there are many instances of its use as late as the time of Charles I. Hence, torture, extreme pain; anguish.

A fit of the stone puts a king to the rack, and makes him as miserable as it does the meanest subject.

Sir W. Temple

Racodium (ra-kö'di-um), n. [From Gr. rakos, a torn garment, in allusion to the appearance of the plants.] A genus of fungi, some of the species of which are found in old wine-cellar. One is called Racodium cellare.

Racoon (ra-kön), n. See RACCOON.

Racoonda (ra-kön'dä), n. The coypu (which see).

Racovian (rä-kö'vi-an), n. A member of a Polish sect of Unitarians: so called from Racow, where they have a public seminary for the teaching of their doctrines.

Racovian (rä-kö'vi-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Racovians; as, the Racovian catechism.

Racquet (rak'et), n. Same as Racket.

Racy (rä'si), a. (See RACE, lineage, also a particular flavour; but comp. O.H.G. räzer, räzer win, racy wine; Swiss räts, sharp, cutting, astringent.] 1. Strong; flavoured; tasting of the soil; as, racy cider; racy wine.

The hospitable sage, in sign
Of social welcome, mixed the racy wine. Pope.
2. Having a strong distinctive character of thought or language; spirited; pungent; piquant; as, a racy style; a racy anecdote.

Rich racy verses, in which we
The soil from which they come, taste, smell, and see. Cowley.

Burns' English, though not so racy as his Scotch, is generally correct; perhaps the more so, because he was obliged to ponder upon it a little. H. Coleridge.

Rad, pret. of ride. Rode. Spenser.

Rad, Radde, pret. of read and rede. Advised; explained. Chaucer.

Rad (rad), n. A contraction for Radical (reformer). [Colloq.]

He's got what will buy him bread and cheese when the Radi shut up the church. Trailguy.

Rad (rad), a. [Ice. hræddr, afraid.] Afraid. Burns. [Scotch.]

Raddle (rad'l), v.t. [Other forms are redle, ruddle, and the word is perhaps a corruption from hurdle or riddle.] 1. To interweave; to twist; to wind together. 'Raddling or working it up like basket work.' De Poe.—2. To wrinkle. 'Raddled old face.' Thackeray.

Raddle (rad'l), n. 1. A branch or supple piece of wood interwoven with others between stakes to form a fence; also a piece of lath or similar slip of wood. [Provincial.] 2. A hedge formed by interweaving the shoots and branches of trees or shrubs. [Provincial.]—3. A wooden bar, with a row of upright pegs, employed by domestic weavers in some parts to keep the warp of a proper width, and to prevent it from becoming entangled when it is wound upon the beam.

Raddle (rad'l), n. A red pigment, chiefly used for marking sheep. See REDDLE, RUDDLE.

Raddle (rad'l), v.t. 1. To paint, as with ruddle.—2. To get over work in a careless slovenly manner.

Raddle-hedge (rad'l-hej), n. A hedge formed by interweaving the branches or twigs together. Horne Tooker.

Raddock (rad'ök), n. The robin-redbreast or ruddock.

Rade (räd), pp. Rode. [Scotch.]

Rade (räd), n. Same as Raid.

Radeau (rä-dö), n. [Fr. from L. ratia, a raft.] A number of pieces bound together so as to form a float; a raft.

Three vessels under sail, and one at anchor, above Split Rock, and behind it the radéau Thunderer. W. Irving.

Radevora, n. [Ety. uncertain.] Tapestry. Chaucer.

Radial (rä'di-al), a. [From L. radius, a ray, a spoke. See RADIUS and RAY.] 1. Having the quality or appearance of a ray, or a radius; grouped or appearing like radii or rays; shooting out as from a centre.—2. Pertaining to the radius, one of the bones of the forearm of the human body; as, the radial artery or nerve.—3. In bot. growing on the circumference of a circle.—Radial curves, in geom. curves of the spiral kind, whose ordinates all terminate in the centre of the including circle, and appear like so many semidiameters.—Radial symmetry, in animals, the particular disposition of parts (seen in starfishes, &c.) in which the elements of form are developed around a central point.

Radially (rä'di-al-li), adv. In a radial manner; in the manner of radii or rays; as, lines diverging radially.

Radiance (rä'di-ans), n. [From radiant.] Properly, brightness shooting in rays or beams; hence in general, brilliant or sparkling lustre; vivid brightness. 'The sacred radiance of the sun.' Shak.

The Son
Girt with omnipotence, with radiance crown'd
Of majesty divine. Milton.
Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of eternity. Shelley.

SYN. Lustre, brilliancy, splendour, glare, glitter.

Radiancy (rä'di-an-si), n. Same as Radiance. 'A glory surpassing the sun in its greatest radiancy.' Bp. Burnet.

Radiant (rä'di-ant), a. [L. radians, radiant, ppr. of radio, to beam or shoot rays, from radius, a ray.] 1. Radiating; giving out rays; proceeding in the form of or resembling rays; radiated; radiate.—2. Especially, darting, shooting or emitting rays of light or heat; shining; sparkling; beaming with brightness; emitting a vivid light or splendour; as, the radiant sun. 'Radiant in glittering arms and beamy pride.' Milton.

3. In her. an epithet for any ordinary or charge when it is represented edged with rays or beams; rayonant or rayonnée.—Radiant heat, heat proceeding in straight lines or directly from a heated body, after the manner of light, in distinction from heat conducted or carried by intervening media.—Radiant point, in physics, the point from which rays of light or heat proceed; also called the Radiating Point.—Radiant flower, in bot. see RADIATE.

Radiant (rä'di-ant), n. 1. In optics, the luminous point or object from which light emanates, that falls on a mirror or lens.—2. In astron. the point in the heavens from which a star-shower seems to proceed; thus, γ Andromede in the constellation Leo is the radiant of the November star-showers, known as Leonides.—3. In geom. a straight line proceeding from a given point or fixed pole, about which it is conceived to revolve. Radiantly (rā'di-ant-lī), adv. With radiant or beaming brightness; with glittering splendour.

Thirteen hundred years ago, the grey moorland showed as it does this day and the purple mountains stood as radiantly in the deep distances of evening. Ruskin.

Radiary (rā'di-ā-rī), n. One of the Radiata. [Rare and obsolete.]

Radiata (rā'di-ā'tā), n. pl. [Lit. rayed animals, from L. radius, a ray.] The name given by Cuvier to the fourth great division of the animal kingdom, including those animals whose parts are arranged round an axis, and on one or several radii, or on one or several lines extending from one pole to the other. In modern zoology Cuvier's division has been abolished, and the Radiata have been divided into the Protozoa, Coelenterata, and Annuloida or Echinodermata. The cut shows (1) the sea-anemone, (2) jelly-fish, (3) star-fish.

Radiate (rā'di-āt), v. i. pret. & pp. radiated; ppr. radiating. [L. radio, radiatum, to beam or shoot rays. See RAY.] 1. To issue and proceed in rays or straight lines from a point or surface, as heat or light; especially, to proceed or issue in rays or beams of light; to shine.

Light radiates from luminous bodies directly to our eyes. Locke.

2. To emit rays; to be radiant; as, the sun or other luminous body radiates.—3. To proceed as from a centre.

O tell me where the passions meet
Whence radiate. Tennyson.

Radiate (rā'di-āt), v. t. 1. To emit or send out in direct lines from a point or surface; as, a body radiates heat.—2. To enlighten; to illuminate; to shed light or brightness on; to irradiate. [Rare.]

Radiate (rā'di-āt), a. 1. Having rays; adorned with rays; having lines proceeding as from a centre.—2. In mineral. having crystals or fibres diverging as from a centre. 3. In zool. belonging to the division Radiata. 4. In bot. rayed; having a ray: said of a compound flower consisting of a disc, in which the corollae or florets are tubular, and of ray, in which the florets are ligulate or strap-shaped, as the daisy, marigold, &c.; or a flower with several semi-fusculous florets, set round a disc in form of a radiant star.

Radiate (rā'di-āt), n. In zool. a member of the Cuvierian division Radiata.

Radiated (rā'di-āt-ed), p. and a. Adorned with rays; having rays; radiate.

The radiated head of the phoenix gives us the meaning of a passage in Ausonius. Adrian.

—Radiated iron pyrites, a variety of sulphide of iron of a pale bronze yellow. It occurs, regularly crystallized, in radiated, granular, and lamellar concretions. But more frequently its form is globular, botryoidal, reniform, tuberoso, &c.

Radiately (rā'di-āt-lī), adv. In a radiate manner; with radiation from a centre.

Radiatingly (rā'di-āt-ing-lī), adv. In a radiating manner.

Radiation (rā'di-ā'shon), n. [L. radiatio, radiationis.] 1. The act of radiating or state of being radiated; emission and diffusion of rays of light.—2. The divergence or shooting forth of anything from a point or surface, like the diverging rays of light; as, the radiation of heat, of sound, &c. The intensity of the radiation of heat varies with the nature of the radiating body, and the state of its surface with regard to polish, colour, source of heat, &c. Its intensity in a vacuum is inversely as the square of the distance from the radiating point.—Solar radiation, the heat which the earth receives from the sun.—Terrestrial radiation, the heat which escapes from the earth into the regions of space.

Radiative (rā'di-āt-iv), a. Having a tendency to radiate; possessing the quality of radiation. 'Gas whose radiative power was to be determined.' Hirst.

Radiator (rā'di-āt-ēr), n. That which radiates; a body or substance from which rays emanate or radiate; specifically, that part of a heating apparatus the use of which is to radiate heat.

Radical (rā'di-kal), a. [Fr., from L. radicalis, from radix, radicis, a root (whence radish, eradicate);] 1. Pertaining to the root or origin; original; reaching to the principles; fundamental; thorough-going; extreme; as, a radical truth or error; a radical evil; a radical difference of opinions or systems; a radical cure or reform. 'Such a radical truth, that God is.' Bentley.

The most determined exertions of that authority, against them, only showed their radical inclination. Burke.

2. Implanted by nature; innate; native; constitutional.—3. In philol. belonging to or proceeding directly from a root; of the character of a root; primitive; original; underived; as, a radical word; the radical signification of a word.—4. In bot. proceeding immediately from the root or from a stem and close to the root; as, a radical leaf or peduncle.—Radical leaves, leaves close to the ground, clustered at the base of a stem, as in the cowslip and dandelion.—Radical peduncle, one that proceeds from the axil of a radical leaf, as in the primrose and cowslip.—Radical bass, in music, the same as Fundamental Bass.—Radical pitch, the pitch or tone with which the utterance of a syllable begins.—Radical stress, in elocution, the force of utterance falling on the initial part of a syllable or word.—Radical quantities, in alg. quantities whose roots may be accurately expressed in numbers. The term is sometimes extended to all quantities under the radical sign.—Radical sign, the sign $\sqrt{\quad}$ (a modified form of the letter r, the initial of L. radix, root) placed before any quantity, denoting that its root is to be extracted; thus, \sqrt{a} or $\sqrt{a+b}$. To distinguish the particular root a number is written over the sign; thus, $\sqrt[3]{\quad}$, $\sqrt[4]{\quad}$, &c., denote respectively the square root, cube root, fourth root, &c. In the case of the square root, however, the number is usually omitted, and merely the sign written.

Radical (rā'di-kal), n. 1. In philol. (a) a primitive word; a radix, root, or simple underived uncompounded word. (b) A primitive letter; a letter that belongs to the root.—2. In politics, a member of the party which desires to have the abuses which, from the lapse of time or any other cause, may have crept into the government completely rooted out, and a larger portion of the democratic spirit infused into the constitution. The term was first applied as a party name in 1818 to Henry Hunt, Major Cartwright, and others of the same clique, who wished to introduce radical reform in the representative system, and not merely to disfranchise and enfranchise a borough or town.

In politics they (the Independents) were, to use the phrase of their own time, 'Root-and-Branch men,' or, to use the kindred phrase of our own, Radicals. Macaulay.

3. In chem. a term used in its broadest sense to designate all substances, simple or compound, which combine with any of the more electro-negative elements to form compounds either acid, neutral, or basic; but more generally and narrowly, applied only to compounds of elements, as ammonium and cyanogen, which have themselves an elementoid nature, and perform elemental functions. The alcohols and ethers and other important classes of organic compounds were at one time almost universally regarded as containing certain compound elementoid groups of carbon and hydrogen atoms called methyl, ethyl, propyl, butyl, &c. At present another radical is supposed by many to be contained in the alcohols, called hydroxyl (HO), and many do not regard the existence of the former series as essential.

Radicalism (rā'di-kal-izm), n. The doctrine or principle of making a radical or thorough and searching reform, as in government or other existing institutions, by the uprooting of all real or supposed abuses connected therewith.

Radicalism means root-work; the uprooting of all falsehoods and abuses. F. W. Robertson.

Radicality (rā'di-kal-ī-tī), n. 1. The state or quality of being radical; relation to a root in essential nature or principle.—2. \dagger Origination.

There may be equivocal seeds and hermaphrodite principles, that contain the radicality and power of different forms. Sir T. Brown.

Radically (rā'di-kal-ī), adv. 1. In a radical manner; at the origin or root; fundamentally; as, a scheme or system radically wrong or defective.—2. Primatively; essentially; originally; without derivation. 'These great orbs thus radically bright.' Prior.

Radicalness (rā'di-kal-nes), n. The state of being radical or fundamental.

Radicate (rā'di-kant), a. [L. radicans, radicans, ppr. of radico, to take root.] In bot. producing roots from any part other than the radicle.

Radicate (rā'di-kāt), v. t. pret. & pp. radicated; ppr. radicating. [L. radico, radicans, from radix, radicis, a root.] To root; to cause to take root; to plant deeply and firmly. 'Radicate in us the remembrance of God's goodness.' Barrow.

Meditation will radicate these seeds. Hammond.

Radicate (rā'di-kāt), a. Same as Radicated.

Radicate (rā'di-kāt), v. i. To take root.

For evergreens, especially such as are tender, prune them not after planting till they do radicate. Endrey.

Radicated (rā'di-kāt-ed), p. and a. 1. Deeply planted or rooted; firmly established.—2. In bot. rooted, or having taken root; as, a radicated stem.—Radicated shell, in conch. a shell fixed by the base or by a byssus to some other body.

Radicaling (rā'di-kāt-ing), p. and a. In bot. the same as Radicate.

Radication (rā'di-kā'shon), n. [From radicate.] 1. The process of taking root deeply. 'Different habits of sin, and degrees of radication of those habits.' Hammond.—2. In bot. the disposition of the root of a plant with respect to the ascending and descending caudex.

Radicle (rā'di-sel), n. Same as Radicle.

Radicalform (rā-dis'fōrm), a. [L. radix, radicis, a root, and forma, shape.] In bot. being of the nature of a root.

Radicle (rā'di-kl), n. [L. radicula, dim. of radix, a root.] 1. In bot.

r, r, Radicle. cc, Cotyledons.

(a) that part of the embryo or seed of a plant which, upon vegetating, becomes the descending axis or root. (b) The fibrous parts of a root, which are renewed every year, and which absorb the nutriment from the earth.—2. In chem. same as Radical.

Radiceae (rā'di-kōe), a. In bot. having a large root.

Radicular (rā-dik'ū-lēr), n. In bot. pertaining to the radicle.

As the first leaves produced are the cotyledons, this stem is called the cotyledonary extremity of the embryo, while the other is the radicular. Balfour.

Radicle (rā'di-kūl), n. In bot. the same as Radicle.

Radiola (rā'di-ō-lā), n. [From radius, a ray.—in allusion to the capsule being rayed.] A genus of plants, nat. order Linaceae. The R. millegrana, or all-seed, is a minute much-branched British plant, growing on moist, gravelly, and boggy soils.

Radiolaria (rā'di-ō-lā'ri-ā), n. pl. An order of Protozoa of the class Rhizopoda, characterized by possessing a siliceous or flinty test or siliceous spicules, and being provided with pseudopodia, or prolongations of their soft protoplasmic bodies, which stand out like radiating filaments, and occasionally run into one another. The marine Radiolaria all inhabit the superficial stratum of the sea, and fabricate their skeletons at the expense of the infinitesimally small proportion of silica which is dissolved in sea-water. When they die these skeletons sink to the bottom, forming geological strata. Extensive masses of tertiary rock, such as that which is found at Oran, and that which occurs at Blaser Hill in Barbadoes, are very largely made up of exquisitely preserved skeletons of Radiolaria, which are erroneously named 'fossil Infusoria.' But though there can be little doubt that Radiolaria abounded in the cretaceous sea, none are found in the chalk, their siliceous skeletons having probably been dissolved and redeposited as flint.

Radiolarian (râ'di-ô-lâr-i-ân) n. In zool. a member of the order Radiolaria.

Radiolite (râ'di-ô-lî-tî) n. [Fr. radiolite, from L. radius, a ray, and lithos, a stone.] 1. One of a genus of fossil lamellibranchiate molluscs, obtained from that part of the Pyrenees which is named Les Corbières, and from cretaceous rocks. They are striated externally, the inferior valve is in the form of a reversed cone; the superior, convex. Sometimes called Sphaerulite. — 2. A variety of natrolite.

Radiometer (râ-dî-om-ê-t-er) n. [L. radius, a rod, a ray, and Gr. metron, measure.] 1. The forestaff (which see). 2. An instrument designed for measuring the mechanical effect of radiant energy. It consists of four crossed arms of very fine glass, supported in the centre by a needle-point having at the extreme end thin discs of platinum blackened on one side. The instrument is placed in a glass vessel exhausted of air, and when exposed to rays of light or heat the wheel moves more or less rapidly in proportion to the strength or weakness of the rays.

Radio-muscular (râ-dî-ô-mus'kû-lâr) n. In anat. a term applied to the branches sent off from the radial artery to the muscles of the forearm in the first part of its course. Also applied to the nervous filaments which the radial nerve sends to the same muscles.

Radiant (râ-dî-ut) n. 1. Consisting of rays, as light. Radiant. — 2. Radiating, radiant.

His radiant head with shambled throat they bear
G. Fisher

Radiash (râ'dî-ash) n. [Fr. radius, a radius, from L. radius, a ray.] The popular name of Raphanus sativus, the roots of which are eaten raw. See RAPHANUS.

When he was naked, he was, for all the world, like a forked radish, with a head fantastically carved upon it with a knife. Shaks.

Radial (râ'dî-âl) n. [Fr. radius, a radius, from L. radius, a ray.] The popular name of Raphanus sativus, the roots of which are eaten raw. See RAPHANUS.

Radius (râ'dî-us), n. pl. Radii, Radiuses (râ'dî-i, râ'dî-us-es). [L. a ray, a rod, a beam, a spoke. Hence ray.] 1. In geom.

a straight line drawn or extending from the centre of a circle to the circumference, or from the centre of a sphere to its surface, and hence the semi-diameter of the circle or sphere. In trigon. the whole side, or sine of 90° — 2. In CA, CB, CR, CH, RADI. consider anat. the base of the forelimb of vertebrate animals, which, as in man, when the arm is laid flat with the palm upwards, lies to the thumb side of the limb. — 3. In bot. a ray, the outer part or circumference of a compound radiate flower, or radiated discous flower. — 4. In bot. a line drawn from the centre of the polygon to the end of the outer side. — Radius of curvature of a curve at any point, the radius of the circle, which has the same curvature as the curve at that point. — Radius vector, pl. radii vectores, (a) in astron. an imaginary straight line joining the centre of an attracting body, as the sun, with that of a body, as a planet, describing an orbit round it. (b) In geom. a straight line, or the length of each line, connecting any point, as of a curve, with a fixed point or pole, round which it revolves, and to which it serves to refer the successive points of a curve in a system of polar co-ordinates. See Analytical geometry under ANALYTIC. — Radial bone, radius, radius, the guide-bone of the parallel motion of a steam-engine.

Radix (râ'dî-kî) n. [L. a root.] 1. In stem. a primitive word from which spring other words a radical, a root. — 2. In math. any number which is arbitrarily made the fundamental number or base of any system. Thus 10 is the radix of the decimal system of numeration, also in Briggs', or the common system of logarithms, the radix is 10; in Napier's it is 2.7182818284. All other numbers are considered as some powers or roots of the radix, the exponents of which powers or roots constitute the logarithms of those numbers respectively. — 3. In alg. the root of a finite expression from which a series is derived. (Bar.) — 4. In bot. the root of a plant. In the medicina moderna the term is employed to designate the roots of medicinal plants, or certain preparations of them. — 5. In anat. a term applied to some parts which are inserted into others, or spring from them, as a root from the earth; as the fangs, the origin of some of the nerves, &c.

Radoub (râ-dob) n. [Fr.] In mercantile law, the repairs made to a ship, and a fresh supply of furniture and victuals, provisions and other provisions required for a voyage. Wharton.

Radula (râ'dû-lâ) n. [L. a scraper, from rado, to scrape.] In zool. the file or rasp-like organ in the mouth of the gasteropodous mollusca.

Raduliform (râ-dû-lî-form) n. [L. radula, a scraper and forma, shape.] Rasp-shaped; specifically, said of the teeth of certain fishes, resembling villiform teeth in being conical, sharp-pointed, and close-set, but of larger size.

Rae (râ) n. Ros. [Scottish.]

Raff (râf), v. t. [O Fr. rafer, rafer, to snatch, to seize, from O rafer, to sweep, seize, snatch, allied to A. Sax. rafian, to seize; Dan. rafte, to raffie. Root perhaps allied to L. rapio, to seize.] To sweep, to snatch, draw, or huddle together, to take by a promiscuous sweep. 'Their causes and effects, which I thus raff up together.' Rich. Crozer.

Raff (râf), n. 1. A promiscuous lump or collection, a jumble.

The crowd of Tross was commingled to settle a raff of errors and superstitious. Barrow.

2. Lumber, sweepings; refuse; scum. — Hence — 3. A person of worthless character; the scum or sweepings of society, the rabble; used chiefly in the compound or duplicated form riff raff.

Raffish (râf-îsh) n. A fine kind of Majolica ware, which took its name from the supposition that the designs were painted by Raffaello.

Raffish (râf-îsh) n. Resembling or having the character of the raff or rabble, villainous, scampish, worthless, refuse. 'Five or six raffish looking men.' Lord Lytton.

Raffle (râf-lî) n. [Fr. raffo, O Fr. raffo, a kind of game as dice, raffo, to match. See RAFF.] A game of chance or lottery in which several persons deposit a part of the value of the thing, in consideration of the chance of becoming sole possessor by casting dice or otherwise, the money deposited going to the first owner of the article.

New cometh hazard with its apparatus, as tables and raffles, of which cometh deceit, from other chettings, and all evil. Chaucer.

Raffle (râf-lî) n. v. t. pret. & pp. raffled, pp. raffling. To try by the chance of a raff; to engage in a raff, as, to raffle for a watch. 'They were raffling for his coat.' Dryden.

Raffle (râf-lî) n. v. t. To dispose of by means of a raff, as, to raffle a watch.

Raffle-net (râf-lî-net) n. A sort of fishing-net.

Raffer (râf-er) n. One who raffles.

Rafflesia (râf-lî-â) n. [After Sir Stamford Raffles, the discoverer of the first known species.] A genus of parasitical plants, the type of the nat. order Rafflesiaceae, natives of Sumatra and Java, having scales in place of leaves, and exhibiting in some degree the structure both of flowering and flowering plants. R. Arneida is found in the hot damp jungle of Sumatra, growing parasitically on a kind of vine. It seems to consist of little else beyond the flower and root. This flower, however, is of gigantic size, measuring 8 feet in diameter. It is used in Java as a powerful strychnine and opium.

Red and Expanded Flower of Rafflesia Arneida.

Rafflesiaceae (râf-lî-â-sî-â) n. pl. A natural order of rhizophora, the species of which are found in the East Indies, Java, Sumatra, &c., and in South America. The genus Rafflesia is the type. See RAFFLESIA.

Raffling-net (râf-lî-ng-ut) n. The same as Raffle-net.

Raff-merchant (râf-mêr-chant) n. A dealer in lumber or old articles. [Provincial.]

Raft (râf) n. [Properly a boat made of beams or rafters. Local raper, Den. râf, a rafter. See RAFTER.] 1. A sort of boat or framework formed by various logs, planks, or other pieces of timber fastened together side by side, for the convenience of transporting them down rivers, across harbours, &c. — 2. A floating structure used in case of shipwreck, often roughly formed of barrels, planks, spars, &c., hurriedly lashed together. In well appointed vessels life-rafts form a part of the equipment, and are frequently constructed in pontoon-form with stanchions and ropes, to protect the passengers from falling or being washed off, and with a frame for supporting a mast. Such rafts are generally carried in collapsed form for convenient storage, and in this condition they are more easily launched.

Where in that case
That floated with them on the flood râf? Shaks.

3. A floating mass of trees, branches, or other vegetation, obstructing the course of a river, a large collection of timber and fallen trees, such as, floating down the great rivers of the Western United States, are arrested in their downward course by flats or shallows, where they accumulate, and sometimes block up the river for miles.

Numbers of these drift-wood got entangled in the channel of the Mississippi, so that they no longer passed freely down. It was usually they formed a mass termed the râf, distributed irregularly. For a distance of twenty miles, closely matted together in some localities. See H. Dr. to Shaks.

Raft (râf), v. t. To transport on a raft.

Raft (râf), pp. Raft, torn, rent; covered. [Archaic and poetical.]

The factory whizzing of the shaft
And the dull rapping beaming, and the râf
Branch down sweeping from a tall oak top. Kenn.

Raft-bridge (râf-brîj) n. A bridge supported on rafts.

Raft-dog (râf-dog) n. An iron bar with bent over and pointed ends for securing logs together in a raft.

Rafter (râf), pret. & pp. of rafter, rafter. Took or taken away; sawnt; deprived. Chaucer, Spenser.

Rafter (râf-er) n. [A. Sax. rafter; loaf, rafter (pron. rafter, r being merely the sign of the nom.), Den. râf, a rafter, a beam; O G. rafe, rafe, a beam, a rafter.] In building, one of the pieces of timber which follow the slope of the roof, and to which is secured the lath into which the slates or other outer covering matter is nailed. The rafter extends from the eave to the ridge of the roof, at its upper end abutting on a corresponding rafter rising from the opposite side of the roof, or resting against a crown or ridge plate as the case may be. 'In lowly shales with smoky rafters.' Milton. See ROOF.

Rafter (râf-er), v. t. 1. To form into or like rafters, as, to rafter timber. — 2. To furnish or build with rafters, as, to rafter a house. 3. In ag. to plough up one-half of the land, by turning the grass-side of the ploughed furrow on the land that is left unploughed.

Rafter (râf-er) n. A labourer who brings logs of wood from the ship in which they are imported in rafts to the shore.

How the poor casual deal-powers and rafters live during six months of the year. I cannot conceive. Milton.

Raft-merchant (râf-mêr-chant) n. Same as Raff-merchant.

Raft-port (râf-pôrt) n. A neat large square hole, framed and cut immediately under the counter, or forward between the breast-hooks of the bow of some ships, to load or unload timber.

Rafterman (râf-er-man) n. A man who manages a raft.

Raffy (râf-î), n. [Perhaps for raffy, from raff, lumber, transparency.] 1. Musty; stale. 2. Damp, misty. [Provincial.]

Rag (rag) n. [The original meaning was apparently a tuft of rough hair; comp. Sw. Den. dial. ragg, rough hair, local ragg, thagines, a tuft, allied also to E. rag.] 1. Any piece of cloth torn from the rest; a tattered cloth, torn or worn till its texture is destroyed, a fragment of dress, a shred; a tatter, as, linen and cotton rags are the chief materials of the finest paper.

Woolen rags of a loose texture and not too much worn are unravelled by means of machinery, and mixed up with good wool to form what is known as 'cheviot,' of which cheap vesting goods are made. See RAG.

2. pl. Tattered garments, garments worn out, proverbially. Mean dress.

bar of wood or metal extending from one upright post to another, as in fences.—2. In joinery, the horizontal timbers in any piece of framing or panelling; as, (a) in a door, sash, or any panelled work, one of the horizontal pieces between which the panels lie are called rails, the vertical pieces between which the panels are inserted being called stiles. The same name is given to (b) the upper pieces into which the balusters of a stair are mortised. (c) One of the pieces connecting the posts of a bedstead, and known as head-rail, foot-rail, and side-rail, according to position.—3. A series of posts or balusters connected by cross beams, bars, or rods, for inclosure, &c. More usually termed a Railing.—4. Naut. (a) The moulded planks mortised into the heads of the stanchions, and in some cases into the timberheads forming the upper fence of the bulwarks; the part continued round the stern is the tail-rail. (b) A curved piece of timber from the bow to support the knee of the head.—Forecastle rail, the rail extended on stanchions across the after part of the fore-castle-deck.—Poop rail, a rail across the forepart of the poop or quarter-deck.—Top rail, a rail extended on stanchions across the after part of each of the tops.—5. Railroad (rāl'rōd), n. See RAILWAY. [This word is less common in England than railway, but is the term generally used in America.]

Railway (rāl'wā), n. [Rail and way.]

1. A road or way having parallel iron or steel rails along it, on which the wheels of carriages are made to run in order to lessen friction. These rails were originally formed of wooden beams, and the wheels of the wagons had flanges on one side of the periphery, which confined them to the tracks. The wooden rails were succeeded by iron plates, called plate-rails, with flanges or upturned ledges along one side, to prevent the wheels leaving them. The modern railway consists of one or more series of pairs of iron or steel bars, called edge-rails, laid parallel to each other, and several feet apart. The width between the rails is called the gauge. The narrow gauge measures 4 feet 8½ inches between the rails; the broad gauge (now dying out) 7 feet. The narrow is the national gauge of Great Britain, and over the greater part of Europe. A pair of parallel rails constitutes a single line of railway, two pairs a double line, and so on. The rails are supported at a little height above the general surface by iron pedestals called chairs, which again are firmly fixed to wooden or iron supports called sleepers, placed at intervals and embedded in the material of the roadway. (See RAIL, CHAIR, SLEEPER.) A railway, in general, approaches as nearly to a straight line between its two extremes as the nature of the country and the necessities of the intermediate traffic will permit. It is carried over valleys, either by embankments or viaducts, and through hills or elevated ground by deep trenches called cuttings, or by tunnels. In favourable cases the surface line of the railway is so adjusted that the materials excavated from the cuttings will just serve to form the embankments. Such a line is termed a balancing line. Should the excavated material be in excess it is termed spoil, and deposited in a convenient place, where it forms a spoil bank; but should it be in too small quantity to form the embankment, recourse is had to an excavation along the sides of the site of the latter to supply the deficiency. This is termed side cutting. The balancing line or surface line of the railway may or may not be level, and its various slopes are termed gradients, and the arrangement of the rises and falls is termed the grading of the line. A more or less steep ascent is termed an incline. When the line is formed its surface is covered with broken stones or clean gravel called ballasting, and in this the wooden sleepers, or stone blocks for sustaining the rails, are embedded. The sleepers are laid across the roadway about 3 feet apart from centre to centre, and to them the chairs which sustain the rails are spiked. Sometimes longitudinal wooden sleepers are used along with the transverse sleepers. These consist of beams laid under the rails and secured to the transverse sleepers. When such are used chairs are frequently dispensed with, the rails being formed with a flange at bottom which is fastened directly to the wooden beam. When the railway is thus completed, the work is called the permanent way. In the railway of a single line of rail, it is necessary to make provision for permitting meeting carriages to pass each other by means of sidings, which are short additional railways laid at the side of the main line, and so connected with it at each extremity that a carriage can pass into the siding in place of proceeding along the main line. In double lines, in addition to sidings, which are in them also required, it is necessary to provide for carriages crossing from one line to another. The change in the direction of the carriage, in both cases, is effected by switches and turn-tables. The annexed cut shows a system of rails arranged for the junction of one double line of rails with another, and known as a main-line junction. The various places along the line of railway, where carriages stop for taking up or depositing goods or passengers, are termed stations, with the prefix of goods or passenger, as they are allotted to the one or the other; the stations at the extremities of a railway are called termini. Steam power is usually employed in moving the carriages or wagons by means of a locomotive engine, that is, a steam-engine mounted on a framework, with wheels made to run upon the rails. By its weight and the friction of its wheels on the rails a tractive force is provided by which it is enabled to move at a high rate of velocity, and to drag great loads after it. In some particular cases a fixed engine is employed to give motion to a rope by which the carriages are dragged along, the rope being either an endless rope stretched over pulleys, or one which winds and unwinds on a cylinder. Such engines are termed stationary engines, and are used chiefly on inclined planes, where the ascent is too steep for the locomotive engine. In some cases the carriages are impelled by atmospheric pressure. See Atmospheric Railway under ATMOSPHERIC. 2. In an extended sense, all the land, works, buildings, and machinery required for the support and use of the road or way, with its rails.

As to the disappearance of y compare rail, hail, tail.] 1. The descent of water in drops from the clouds, or the water thus falling. Rain depends upon the formation and dissolution of clouds. The invisible aqueous vapour suspended in the atmosphere, which forms clouds, and is deposited in rain, is derived from the evaporation of water, partly from land, but chiefly from the vast expanse of the ocean. At a given temperature the atmosphere is capable of containing no more than a certain quantity of aqueous vapour, and when this quantity is present the air is said to be saturated. Air may at any time be brought to a state of saturation by a reduction of its temperature, and if cooled below a certain point the whole of the vapour can no longer be held in suspension, but a part of it condensed from the gaseous to the liquid state will be deposited in dew or float about in the form of clouds. If the temperature continues to decrease, the vesicles of vapour composing the cloud will increase in number and begin to descend by their own weight. The largest of these falling fastest will unite with the smaller ones they encounter during their descent, and thus drops of rain will be formed of a size that depends on the thickness, density, and elevation of the cloud. The point to which the temperature of the air must be reduced in order to cause a portion of its vapour to form clouds or dew is called the dew-point. It is considered that an inch of rain on an acre gives above 101 tons of water. The average rainfall in a year at any given place depends on a great variety of circumstances, as latitude, proximity to the sea, elevation of the region, configuration of the country and mountain ranges, exposure to the prevailing winds, &c. Various prefixes applied to the name rain indicate the nature of various substances which fall on the earth's surface. Thus blood-rain is formed by a shower of lower plants or algae of red colour; and sulphur-rain or yellow-rain results from the pollen of fir-trees being blown in immense showers by the wind. — 2. A shower or pouring down of anything.

The fair from high the passing pomp behold;
A rain of flowers is from the windows rolled.
Dryden.

Rain (rān), v.t. [A. Sax. regnan, reinan, from the noun.] 1. To fall in drops from the clouds, as water: used mostly with it for a nominative; as, it rains; it will rain; it rained, or it has rained.

The rain is winning every day. Shak.

2. To fall or drop like rain; as, tears rained from their eyes.

And when the tide of combat stands,
Perfume and flowers fall in showers.

That lightly rain from ladies' hands. Temple.

Rain (rān), v.i. To pour or shower down, like rain from the clouds; to pour or send down abundantly.

Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you.

Rainbeat (rān'bēt), n. Beaten or injured by rain. 'Figures half obliterate in rain-beat marble.' By Hall.

Rain-bird (rān'bērd), n. A name given in the West Indies to a species of scissorbill or climbing bird, the ground cuckoo, the Cuculus vetula of Linnaeus, Saurathera vetula of modern naturalists. Its colour is soft brown-gray upon the back, dullish yellow on the under part of the body, and rusty red upon the wings. The tail is beautifully barred with black and white. Its wings are rather short and weak, so that it does not fly to any great distance when alarmed, but sits to a branch a few yards in advance and turns round to look at the intruder. It feeds on large caterpillars, locusts, spiders, mice, and lizards. It is sometimes called Tom Fool, because, in order to gratify its curiosity, it will sit still and allow itself to be struck from its perch.

by the sun's rays entering the upper part of the falling drops of rain, and undergoing two refractions and one reflection; and the secondary, by the sun's rays entering the under part of the drops, and undergoing two refractions and two reflections. Hence, the colours of the secondary bow are fainter than those of the primary. The moon sometimes forms a bow or arch of light, more faint than that formed by the sun, and called a lunar rainbow. — Spirious or super-natural rainbows, a bow always seen in connection with a fine rainbow, lying close inside the violet of the primary bow, or outside that of the secondary one. Its colours are with a funnel at the top where the rain enters. Connected with the cylinder at the lower part is a glass tube with an attached scale. The water which enters the funnel stands at the same height in the cylinder and glass tube, and being visible in the latter the height is read immediately on the scale, and the cylinder and tube being constructed so that the sum of the areas of their sections is a given part, for instance a tenth of the area of the funnel at its orifice, each inch of water in the tube is equivalent to the tenth of an inch of water entering the mouth of the funnel. A stop-cock is added for drawing off the water. As, however, the glass tube frequently gets broken, or bursts during frost, a still simpler gauge has been proposed. This consists of a funnel having a diameter of 4.607 inches, or an area of 17.33 inches. Now as a fluid ounce contains 1.733 cubic inches, it follows that a fluid ounce collected by this gauge is of an inch of rain has fallen.

They have radical or alternate leaves (opposite in Clematis), regular or irregular, often large and handsome flowers, and fruits consisting of one-seeded achenes or many-seeded follicles. There are about thirty genera and 500 species. They have usually poisonous qualities, as evinced by aconite and hellebore in particular, the roots of several species of which are drastic purgatives. Some of them are objects of beauty, as the larkspurs, ranunculus, anemone, and peony.

Ranunculaceous (ra-nun'kü-lá'shús), a. Belonging to the ranunculus or its allied genera.

Ranunculus (ra-nun'kü-lus), n. [L., dim. of rana, a frog—a name first given to the aquatic ranunculus because it floats in marshes, ditches, borders of rivers, &c., and thence extended to the whole genus.]

A genus of herbaceous plants, the type of the nat. order Ranunculaceæ. They have entire, lobed, or compound leaves, and usually panicled, white or yellow flowers. The species are numerous, and almost exclusively inhabit the northern hemisphere. Almost all the species are acrid and caustic, and poisonous when taken internally, and, when externally applied, will raise blisters, which are followed by deep ulcerations if left too long. The various species found wild in Britain are known chiefly by the common names of crow-foot and spearwort. R. flammula and aceleratus are powerful epispastics, and are used as such in the Hebrides, producing a blister in about an hour and a half. Beggars use them for the purpose of forming artificial ulcers to excite the compassion of the public. R. Ficaria (also called Ficaria ranunculoides) is the lesser celandine. R. aquatilis is the water crowfoot, a nutritive food for cattle. R. asiaticus yields numerous cultivated varieties. The white flowers of R. acronitifolius have gained it the name of white bachelors' buttons; while yellow bachelors' buttons is a name for a double variety of R. acris.

Turned by a gentle fire, and roasted rare. Dryden.

Rarebit (rár-bit), n. [A word made by etymologists to account for the expression 'Welsh rabbit.' See under RABBIT.] A dainty morsel; a Welsh rabbit.

Rareeshow (rá-ré-shó), n. [Rare and show.] A peep-show; a show carried about in a box. As these shows were chiefly exhibited by foreigners, they received the name rarees from the mode in which the exhibitors pronounced the word rare.

The fashions of the town affect us like a rareeshow, we have the curiosity to peep at them, and nothing more. Pope.

Rarefaction (rá-ré-fak'shon or rar-e-fak'shon), n. [Fr. See RAREFY.] The act or process of making rare, or of expanding or distending bodies, by separating the constituent particles, by which operation they appear under a larger bulk, or require more room, without an accession of new matter; or rarefaction is an augmentation of the intervals between the particles of matter, whereby the same number of particles occupy a larger space. The term is chiefly used in speaking of the æriform fluids, the terms dilatation and expansion being applied in speaking of solids and liquids. Rarefaction is opposed to condensation.

Rarefiable (rá-ré-fi-á-bl or rar-e-fi-á-bl), a. Capable of being rarefied.

Rarefy (rá-ré-fi or rar-e-fi), v.t. pret. & pp. rarefied; ppr. rarefying. [Fr. rarefier; L. rarefacio—rarus, rare, and facio, to make.] To make rare, thin, porous, or less dense; to expand or enlarge a body without adding to it any new portion of its own matter: opposed to condense.

Rarefy (rá-ré-fi or rar-e-fi), v.i. To become rare, that is not dense or less dense.

Earth rarefies to dew; expanded more,
The subtil dew in air begins to soar. Dryden.

Rarely (rár'li), adv. In a rare degree or manner: (a) seldom; not often; as, things rarely seen; (b) finely; excellently. 'The person who played so rarely on the flageolet.' Sir W. Scott.

I could play Ecles rarely, or a part to tear a cat in, to make all split.

Rareness (rár'nes), n. 1. The state of being rare; (a) the state of being scarce, or of happening seldom; uncommonness; infrequency.

My state,
Seldom but sumptuous, showed like a feast
And won by rareness such solemnity. Shak.
And let the rareness the small gift commend. Dryden.

(b) Thinness; tenuity; as, the rareness of air or vapour.—2. Value arising from scarcity.

Rarripe (rár'rip), a. [Probably a form of ratrripe.] Early ripe; ripe before others, or before the usual season.

Rarripe (rár'rip), n. An early fruit, particularly a kind of peach which ripens early.

Rarity (rár'i-ti), n. [Fr. rareté; L. raritas. See RARE.] 1. The state or quality of being rare: (a) uncommonness; infrequency.

Alas, for the rarity
Of Christian charity,
Under the sun! Hook.

(b) Thinness; tenuity; rareness: opposed to density; as, the rarity of air.

This I do . . . only that I may better demonstrate the great rarity and tenuity of their imaginary chaos. Beattie.

2. That which is rare or uncommon; a thing valued for its scarcity or excellence.

But the rarity of it is—which is indeed almost beyond credit—As many vouched rarities are. Shak.

I saw three rarities of different kinds, which pleased me more than any other shows in the place. Addison.

Ras (ras), n. 1. An Arabic word signifying head, prefixed to the names of promontories or capes on the Arabian and African coasts, &c.—2. Same as Reis.

Rasant, Rasante (rá-zoh, rá-zoh't), a. [Fr. ppr. of raser, to shave.] Applied to a style of fortification in which the command of the works over the country is kept very low, so that the shot may scour or sweep the ground with more effect.

Rascal (ras'kal), n. [Lit. scrapings or refuse of anything; O.E. rascall, rascayle, the rabble, also refuse beasts, especially a worthless lean deer; from a L.L. rasciare, from L. rado, rasum, to shave or scrape, whence also Sp. rascar, It. rasciare, to scrape. Fr. rascaille, the rascality or rascal sort, seems in like manner to come from Fr. raser (for raseler), to scrape.] 1. A lean beast; especially a lean deer, not fit to hunt or kill.

Horns! even so; poor men alone! No, no, the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal! Shak.

2.† A plebeian; one of the common people.

3. A mean fellow; a scoundrel; a trickish dishonest fellow; a rogue; particularly applied to men and boys guilty of the minor offences, and sometimes used in pretended displeasure merely. 'Coney-catching rascals.' Shak. 'Cowardly rascals.' Shak.

Hang him, dishonest rascal! Shak.

I have sense to serve my turn in store,
And he's a rascal who pretends to more. Dryden.

Shall a rascal, because he has read books, talk pertly to me? Cobler.

Rascal (ras'kal), a. 1. Worthless; lean; as, a rascal deer.—2. Mean; low; pitiful; paltry; base.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts. Shak.

Rascalism (ras'kal-izm), n. The state of being a rascal; the dominion of rascals; the rascality. Synonym.

Rascality (ras'kal-i-ti), n. 1. The low mean part of the populace.

Preceded philosophers judge as hypocrites in their way as the rascality in theirs. Chenoweth.

2. Such qualities as make a rascal; mean trickiness or dishonesty; base fraud; the act or acts of a rascal.

Rascal-like (ras'kal-lik), a. Like a low deer. Shak.

Rascalion (ras'kal-yun), n. [From rascal.] See RASCAL. A low mean wretch. 'A base rascalion.' Hudibras.

Rascally (ras'kal-i), a. Like a rascal; meanly trickish or dishonest; vile; base; worthless. 'Our rascally porter.' Shel.

Rase (ras), v. t. pret. & pp. rased; ppr. rasing. [Fr. raser, from L.L. rasare, freq. of L. radere, rasare, to scrape (whence rasper, and also rasen).] 1. To touch superficially in passing; to rub along the surface of; to graze.

Might not the bullet which rased his cheek, have gone into his head? South.

2. To erase; to scratch or rub out, or to blot out; to cancel. 'To rase quite out their native language.' Milnes. (In this sense rase is generally used.)—3. To level with the ground; to overthrow; to destroy. 'Rasering engines bent to rase some capital city.' Milnes. (In this sense rase is generally used; rase may therefore be considered as nearly obsolete.)—STR. To erase, efface, obliterate, expunge, cancel, raze, level, prostrate, overthrow, subvert, destroy, demolish, ruin.

Rase (ras), n. 1. A canal; a groove.—2. A slight wound. 'The least rase of a needle point.' Heath.

Rash (rash), a. [From a Scandinavian or Low German source; L.G. Dan. and Sw. rash, foel, röd, and G. rash, rash.] 1. Hasty in council or action; precipitate; resolving or entering on a project or measure without due deliberation and caution; as, a rash statesman or minister; a rash commander.

For though I am not impetuous and rash, Yet have I in me something dangerous. Shak.

2. Uttered, formed, or undertaken with too much haste or too little reflection; as, rash words; rash measures. 'Rash were my judgment then.' Tennyson.—3. Requiring haste, urgent.

I scarce have leisure to mine you, My counter is so rash. Shak.

4. Quick; sudden; hasty. 'Acquinted or rash gunpowder.' Shak. 'The reason of this rash alarm to know.' Shak. Used adverbially.

Why do you speak so startlingly and rash? Shak.
—Rash, foolhardy, reckless. A rash man is one who undergoes risk from natural impetuosity and without counting the cost. A rash man may be, and often is, a coward when confronted with the consequences of his rashness. A foolhardy man incurs danger out of mere wantonness and in defiance of all consequences. Reckless is nearly allied to rash, but more directly indicates absence of care for, or regard to consequences. The reckless man is generally bold enough, but often with a kind of insane boldness.—STR. Precipitate, headlong, headstrong, foolhardy, hasty, indiscreet, heedless, thoughtless, inconsiderate, careless, impatient, unwary.

Rash (rash), v. t. To put together hurriedly; to prepare with haste.

In thy former edition of Acts and Monuments, we have rashly rushed up at that present, in such abundance of them. Fox.

Rash (rash), n. [foel, rash, rips, matere] Corn in the straw, so dry as to fall out with handling. [foel.]

Rash (rash), n. [It rasia, with some sense.] A kind of inferior silk or silk and steel manufacture.

Rash (rash), n. [O.Fr. rasche, rash, surf, rich, same origin as rascal (which see).] An eruption or efflorescence on the skin. It consists of red patches on the skin, diffused irregularly over the body.

Rash (rash), v. t. [From O.Fr. raser, Mod. Fr. raser, to tear up or away, from L. radere, rasare, to scrape (whence rasper, and also rasen).] 1. To tear or pull violently; to tear asunder.—2. To slice; to cut into pieces, to hack; to divide [said by Mr. Stevens to be particularly applied to the strokes made by the wild bear with his tusks.]

He, I saw'd my quarters in his arm, ras'd his double-breast, ras'd him close by the left cheek, and through his hair. J. Tennyson.

Rasher (rash'er), n. [Either a piece hastily cooked, from rash, a.; or rather a piece sliced off, from above verb.] In cookery, a slice of bacon for frying or broiling.

Rashful (rash'ful), a. Rash; hasty; precipitate. Turberville.

Rasores (ras'or-ee), n. pl. [From L. radere, rasare, to scrape.] Gallinaceous birds or scratchers, an order of birds comprising the sub-orders Gallinae and Columbaceae. The common domestic fowl may be regarded as the type of the order. They are characterized by the toes terminating in strong claws, for scratching up seeds, &c., and by the upper mandible being vaulted, with the nostrils pierced in a membranous space at its base, and covered by a cartilaginous scale. The rasorial birds are, as a rule, polygamous in habits; the pigeons (Columbaceae), however, present an exception to this rule. The common domestic fowl is supposed to be a descendant of the Benkeni jungle-fowl (Gallus Bankeni) of Eastern Asia. See GALLINACEAE, GALLINAE.

1. Head and Feet of Jungle-fowl. 2. Do. of Common Pheasant. 3. Do. of Wild Turkey. 4. Do. of Common Guinea.

Rasorial (ras'or-i-al), a. Pertaining to the rasores. See RASORER.

Rasp (rasp), v. t. [O.Fr. rasper, Mod. Fr. rasper, to scrape or rasp, like Sp. raspar. It rasps, to scrape, grab, rasp, from O.E.G. raspin, to scrape together (D. raspen, Dan. raspe, Sw. raspa).] 1. To rub against with some rough implement; to file with a rasp, to rub or grate with a rough file; as, to rasp wood to make it smooth; to rasp bones to powder. Hence—2. To grate harshly upon; to offend by coarseness or rough treatment or language. Goodrich.

Rasp (rasp), n. [O.Fr. raspe, Mod. Fr. raspe, a rasp or file, from the verb. The fruit no doubt received its name from its rough outside.] 1. A coarse species of file, but having, instead of chisel-cut teeth, its surface dotted with separate protruding teeth, formed by the indentations of a pointed punch.—2. A raspberry (which see). 'Figs in fruit, rasps, vines.' Bacon. (Old and provincial.)

Now will the Caribbea, now the rasps supply Delicious draughts. Y. Adair.

Rasp (rasp), v. t. 1. To rub or grate; as, the rasp rasped against the quay.—2. (As to this meaning comp. G. raspen, to hawl or clear the throat.) To bark; to speak with from the stomach. Sp. Hall. (Old and provincial.)

Raspatory (ras'pa-to-ri), n. A surgeon's rasp, an instrument for scraping bones. Watson.

Raspberry (ras'be-ri), n. [Rasp and berry; so named from the roughness of the fruit. Comp. G. rasbeere, rasbeere, to scratch, and berry.] The well-known fruit of a plant of the genus Rubus, the R. idaeus, a native of Britain, and also of various other parts of Europe. The fruit of the raspberry is extensively used in a variety of ways both by the cook and the confectioner, and also in the preparation of cordial spirituous liquors.

Raspberry-bush (ras'be-ri-bush), n. Rubus idaeus, the bramble producing raspberries.

Raspberry-vinegar (ras'be-ri-vin-e-gar), n. A pleasant acidulous drink made from the juice of raspberries.

Rasper (ras'per), n. 1. One who or that which rasps, a scraper.—2. In far-seeing, a difficult fence, probably from its rasping the horse as it leaps over it. Lower.

Raspist (ras'pist), n. The raspberry Ger.

Rase (ras), n. [Javanese rase, a sensation of the palate or nostrils.] A carnivorous quadruped of the genus Viverra (F. Nasotarsus), closely allied to the civet, spread over a great extent in Asia, including Java, various parts of India, Singapore, Nepal, and other localities. Its perfume, called by the natives dodas, which is secreted in a double pouch like that of the civet, is much valued by the Javonese. For its sake the animal is often kept in captivity. It is savage and irritable, and on account of its long teeth can inflict a very severe bite. The dodas is removed by putting the animal into a long and very narrow box, so that it cannot turn, when it is scooped out with a spoon with impunity.

Rastrites (ras'trit-ee), n. [L. rastrum, a rake.] A genus of extinct Silurian scaphyrm, otherwise named Graptolites.

Rasure (ras'ur), n. [L. rasura, from radere, rasare, to scrape. See RASE.] 1. The act of scraping or shaving; the act of erasing. 2. The mark by which a letter, word, or any part of a writing is erased, effaced, or obliterated; an erasure.

Rat (rat), n. [A word common to the Teutonic and Celtic families; A. Sax. rat, D. rat, G. ratte, ratte, O.E.G. rate, L.G. and Dan. rotte, Udal. raden, Armor. rat, rat. The Fr. rat, Sp. and Pg. rata, are derived forms from Teutonic. The root is probably in L. radere, to gnaw.] 1. A genus of rodent mammalia (Mus, Linn.), one or other of the species of which is familiar to every one, and they are among the greatest animal pests in dwellings, ships, storehouses, and magazines of provisions. Two species are found in habitations in Britain and in most temperate countries, the black rat (M. rattus) and the brown rat (M. domesticus). The first is the oldest inhabitant of this country; the other, which was intro-of snuff, of either a black or brown colour, made from the darker and ranker kinds of tobacco leaves.

Rappel (rap-el), n. [Fr. recall, from L. re, back, and appello, to call.] The roll or beat of the drum to call soldiers to arms.—Rappel of a medal, a decision declaring an exhibitioner to be worthy of the medal though he cannot obtain it in consequence of having obtained an equal or superior reward in a former exhibition.

Rapper (rap-ér), n. 1. One who raps or knocks.—2. The knocker of a door.—3. An oath or a lie (lit. what is rapped out).

Bravely sworn! though this is no flower of the sun, yet I am sure it is something that deserves to be called a rapper. Sp. Parker.

Rappite, Rappist (rap'tít, rap'íst), n. [From George Rapp, the founder of the sect.] The same as Harmonist. See HARMONIST, 2.

Rapport (rap-pórt), n. [Fr., from rapporter, to bring back, to refer—re, again, and apporter, L. apportare—ad, to, and portare, to carry.] A resemblance; a correspondence; an accord or agreement; harmony; affinity. Sir W. Temple.

It did not then occur to me that perhaps our idiosyncrasies were such as not to require even the music of the ballad to produce rapport between our minds, and generate in the brain of the one the vision present in the brain of the other.

Rapscallion (rap-skal'yun), n. [A modified form of rascallion.] A rascal; a rascallion. Hovitt.

Rapscallionry (rap-skal'yun-ri), n. Rascals collectively. Cornhill Mag.

Rapt (rapt), p. and a. [From rap, to snatch, there being a certain confusion with L. rap-tus, seized, from rapio. See RAPTURE.] 1. Transported; enraptured; entirely absorbed. Shak. 'Sometimes so rapt as he would answer me quite from the purpose.' B. Jonson. 'So tranced, so rapt in ecstasies.' Tennyson.—2. Snatched or carried away. 'Rapt from the fickle and the frail.' Tennyson.

Rapti (rapt), v.t. [See above.] 1. To transport or ravish. 'Rapted with my wealth and beauties.' Drayton.—2. To carry away by violence. Chapman.

The Libyan lion . . .
Out-rushing from his den rapt all away.

birds and animals, and are characterized by a strong, curved, sharp-edged, and sharp-pointed beak, and robust short legs, with three toes before and one behind, armed with long, strong, and crooked talons. The eagles, vultures, and falcons are examples.

Raptorial (rap-tó-ri-al), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the Raptors or birds of prey; living by rapine or prey.—2. Adapted to the seizing of prey, as the legs of certain insects. 'The Mantids, with their great raptorial front legs.' H. A. Nicholson.

Raptorial (rap-tó-ri-al), n. A bird of prey; one of the Raptors.

Raptorious (rap-tó-ri-us), a. Raptorial. Arbry.

Rapture (rap'túr), n. [From L. rapio, rap-tum, to seize and carry away; whence also rapine, &c.] 1. A seizing by violence. [Rare.]

Spite of all the rapture of the sea,
This jewel holds his building on my arm. Shak.
2. A hurrying along with velocity; rapidity with violence.

Wave rolling after wave, where way they found,
If steep with torrent rapture; if through plain,
Soft ebbing. Milton.

3. Transport of delight; ecstasy; violence of a pleasing passion; extreme joy or pleasure.

That vision blest . . .
Had put a rapture in her breast,
And on her lips and o'er her eyes
Spread smiles like light. Coleridge.

4. Enthusiasm; uncommon heat of imagination.

You grow correct, that once with rapture writ.
Pope.

5. A fit; a syncope.

Your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry. Shak.
6. Delirium; disorder of mind. 'Brain-sick raptures.' Shak.—SYN. Bliss, ecstasy, transport, delight, exultation.

Rapture (rap'túr), v.t. To inspire with rapture; to transport; to enrapture. 'Raptured I stood.' Pope. 'His raptured thought.' Thomson.

Rapturist (rap'túr-íst), n. An enthusiast. 'Swarms of prophets and rapturists.' Dr. Spencer. [Rare.]

Rapturize (rap'túr-íz), v.t. To put into a state of rapture; to enrapture. [Rare.]

Rapturize (rap'túr-íz), v.i. To become enraptured; to be transported. [Rare.]

Rapturous (rap'túr-us), a. Ecstatic; transporting; ravishing; as, rapturous joy, pleasure, or delight. 'Rapturous exultation.' Young.

Rapturously (rap'túr-us-lí), adv. In a rapturous manner; with rapture; ecstatically.

Rara avis (rá-ra & ví-s), n. [L.] A rare bird; a prodigy; an unusual person; an uncommon object.

Rare (rá-r), a. [Fr. rare, from L. rarus, thin, rare, whence also G. Dan. and Sw. rar, D. raar, rare.] 1. Thinly scattered; sparse. 'Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.' Milton.

He left the barren-beaten thoroughfare,
Chose the green path that show'd the rarer foot. Tennyson.

2. Thin; porous; not dense; as, a rare and attenuate substance. Rare, in physics, is a relative term, the reverse of dense; being used to denote a considerable porosity or vacuity between the particles of a body, as the word dense implies a contiguity or closeness of the particles.

Water is nineteen times lighter and by consequence nineteen times rarer than gold. Newton.

3. Uncommon; not frequent; as, a rare event; a rare phenomenon.

She calls me proud, and that she could not love me,
Were man as rare as phoenix. Shak.

4. Possessing qualities seldom to be met with; especially excellent or valuable to a degree seldom found; said of persons or things. 'O rare Ben Jonson!' Epitaph on Jonson's Tomb. 'Rare work, all fill'd with terror and delight.' Conley.

Above the rest I judge one beauty rare. Dryden.

SYN. Scarce, infrequent, unusual, uncommon, singular, extraordinary, incomparable.

Rare (rá-r), a. [A. Sax. hrér, raw.] Nearly raw; imperfectly roasted or boiled; underdone; as, rare beef or mutton. Written also Rear.

New-laid eggs . . .
Turned by a gentle fire, and roasted rare. Dryden.

Rarebit (rá-ríbít), n. [A word made by etymologists to account for the expression 'Welsh rabbit.' See under RABBIT.] A dainty morsel; a Welsh rabbit.

Rareeshow (rá-ré-shó), n. [Rare and show.] A peep-show; a show carried about in a box. As these shows were chiefly exhibited by foreigners, they received the name rarees from the mode in which the exhibitors pronounced the word rare.

The fashions of the town affect us like a rareeshow, we have the curiosity to peep at them, and nothing more. Pope.

Rarefaction (rá-ré-fak'shon or rar-e-fak'shon), n. [Fr. See RAREFY.] The act or process of making rare, or of expanding or distending bodies, by separating the constituent particles, by which operation they appear under a larger bulk, or require more room, without an accession of new matter; or rarefaction is an augmentation of the intervals between the particles of matter, whereby the same number of particles occupy a larger space. The term is chiefly used in speaking of the aeriform fluids, the terms dilatation and expansion being applied in speaking of solids and liquids. Rarefaction is opposed to condensation.

Rarefiable (rá-ré-fi-a-bl or rar-e-fi-a-bl), a. Capable of being rarefied.

Rarefy (rá-ré-fi or rar-e-fi), v.t. pret. & pp. rarefied; ppr. rarefying. [Fr. rarefier; L. rarefacio—rarus, rare, and facio, to make.] To make rare, thin, porous, or less dense; to expand or enlarge a body without adding to it any new portion of its own matter; opposed to condense.

Rarefy (rá-ré-fi or rar-e-fi), v.i. To become rare, that is not dense or less dense.

Earth rarefies to dew; expanded more,
The subtil dew in air begins to soar. Dryden.

Rarely (rá-ré-lí), adv. In a rare degree or manner; (a) seldom; not often; as, things rarely seen; (b) finely; excellently. 'The person who played so rarely on the flageolet.' Sir W. Scott.

I could play Ercles rarely, or a part to tear a cat in, to make all split. Shak.

Rareness (rá-ré-nés), n. 1. The state of being rare; (a) the state of being scarce, or of happening seldom; uncommonness; infrequency.

My state,
Seldom but sumptuous, showed like a feast
And won by rareness such solemnity. Shak.
And let the rareness the small gift commend. Dryden.

(b) Thinness; tenuity; as, the rareness of air or vapour.—2. Value arising from scarcity.

Rarripe (rá-ríp), a. [Probably a form of rathripe.] Early ripe; ripe before others, or before the usual season.

Rareripe (rá-ríp), a. An early fruit, particularly a kind of peach which ripens early.

Rarity (rá-ri-tí), n. [Fr. rareté; L. raritas. See RARE.] 1. The state or quality of being rare; (a) uncommonness; infrequency.

Alas, for the rarity
Of Christian charity,
Under the sun! Head.

(b) Thinness; tenuity; rareness: opposed to density; as, the rarity of air.

This I do . . . only that I may better demonstrate the great rarity and tenuity of their imaginary chain. Bentley.

2. That which is rare or uncommon; a thing valued for its scarcity or excellence.

But the rarity of it is—which is indeed almost beyond credit—As many vouches rarity are. Shak.
I saw three rarity of different kinds, which pleased me more than any other shows in the place. Addison.

Ras (ras), n. 1. An Arabic word signifying head, prefixed to the names of promontories or capes on the Arabian and African coasts, &c.—2. Same as Reis.

Rasant, Rasante (rá-zoh, rá-zóht), a. [Fr. ppr. of raser, to shave.] Applied to a style of fortification in which the command of the works over the country is kept very low, so that the shot may scour or sweep the ground with more effect.

Rascal (ras'kal), n. [Lit. scrapings or refuse of anything; O.E. rascall, rascaille, the rabble, also refuse beasts, especially a worthless lean deer; from a L.L. rasciare, from L. rado, rasum, to shave or scrape, whence also Sp. rascar, It. rasare, to scrape. Fr. rascaille, the rascality or rascal sort, seems in like manner to come from Fr. rascler (for rascler), to scrape.] 1. A lean beast; especially a lean deer, not fit to hunt or kill.

Horns! even so; poor men alone! No, no, the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal. Shak.

2. A plebeian; one of the common people.

3. A mean fellow; a scoundrel; a trickish dishonest fellow; a rogue; particularly applied to men and boys guilty of the minor offences, and sometimes used in pretended displeasure merely. 'Coney-catching rascals.' Shak. 'Cowardly rascals.' Shak.

Hang him, dishonest rascal! Shak.

I have sense to serve my turn in store,
And he's a rascal who pretends to more. Dryden.

Shall a rascal, because he has read books, talk pertly to me? Coburn.

Rascal (ras'kal), a. 1. Worthless; lean; as, a rascal deer.—2. Mean; low; pitiful; paltry; base.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts. Shak.

Fâte, fâr, fat, fâll; môt, met, hâr; pîne, plin; nôte, not, move; tûbe, tub, bull; oil, pound; y. Sc. abune; y. Sc. ley.

Rascaldom (ras-kal-dm), n. The state of being a rascal; the dominion of rascals; the rascality. Emerson.

Rascality (ras-kal'ti), n. 1. The low mean part of the populace.

Preceded philosophers judge as ignorantly in their way as the rascality in theirs. Gibson.

2. Such qualities as make a rascal; mean trickishness or dishonesty; base fraud; the act or acts of a rascal.

Rascal-like (ras-kal'lik), a. Like a lean deer. Shak.

Rascalion (ras-kal'yun), n. [From rascal.] See RASCAL. A low mean wretch. 'A base rascalion.' Hudibras.

Rascally (ras-kal'i), a. Like a rascal; meanly trickish or dishonest; vile; base; worthless. 'Our rascally porter.' Swift.

Rase (ras), v. t. pret. & pp. rased; ppr. rasing. [Fr. raser, from L. rasere, freq. of radere, to scrape (whence razor, and also rascal).] 1. To touch superficially in passing; to rub along the surface of; to graze.

Might not the bullet which rased his cheek, have gone into his head? South.

2. To erase; to scratch or rub out; or to blot out; to cancel. 'To rase quite out their native language.' Milton. [In this sense rase is generally used.]—3. To level with the ground; to overthrow; to destroy. 'Battering engines bent to rase some capital city.' Milton. [In this sense rase is generally used; rase may therefore be considered as nearly obsolete.]—SYN. To erase, efface, obliterate, expunge, cancel, raze, level, prostrate, overthrow, subvert, destroy, demolish, ruin.

Rase (ras), n. 1. A cancel; erasure.—2. A slight wound. 'The least rase of a needle point.' Hooker.

Rased (rad), See RASED.

Rash (rash), a. [From a Scandinavian or Low German source; L. G. Dan. and Sw. rask, Icel. raskr, D. and G. raskh, rash.] 1. Hasty in council or action; precipitate; resolving or entering on a project or measure without due deliberation and caution; as, a rash statesman or minister; a rash commander.

For though I am not spiteful and rash, Yet have I in me something dangerous. Shak.

2. Uttered, formed, or undertaken with too much haste or too little reflection; as, rash words; rash measures. 'Rash were my judgment then.' Tennyson.—3. Requiring haste; urgent.

I scarce have leisure to salute you, My matter is so rash. Shak.

4. Quick; sudden; hasty. 'Acconitum or rash gunpowder.' Shak. 'The reason of this rash alarm to know.' Shak. Used adverbially.

Why do you speak so startlingly and rash? Shak.

-Rash, Footlardy, Reckless. A rash man is one who undergoes risk from natural impulsiveness and without counting the cost. A rash man may be, and often is, a coward when confronted with the consequences of his rashness. A footlardy man incurs danger out of mere wantonness and in defiance of all consequences. Reckless is nearly allied to rash, but more directly indicates absence of care for, or regard to consequences. The reckless man is generally bold enough, but often with a kind of insane boldness.—SYN. Precipitate, headlong, headstrong, foolhardy, hasty, indiscreet, heedless, thoughtless, inconsiderate, careless, incautious, unwary.

Rash (rash), v. t. To put together hurriedly; to prepare with haste.

In my former edition of Acts and Monuments, so hastily rashed up at that present, in such shortness of time. Fox.

Rash (rash), n. [Icel. raskr, ripe, mature.] Corn in the straw, so dry as to fall out with handling. [Local.]

Rash (rash), n. [It. rascia, with same sense.] A kind of inferior silk or silk and stuff manufacture.

Rash (rash), n. [O. Fr. rasche, rash, sourf, Itch; same origin as rascals (which see).] An eruption or efflorescence on the skin. It consists of red patches on the skin, diffused irregularly over the body.

Rash (rash), v. t. [From O. Fr. crasser, Mod. Fr. crasser, to tear up or away, from L. exradicare—ex, out, and radix, a root.] 1. To tear or pull violently; to tear asunder.—2. To slice; to cut into pieces; to hack; to divide [Said by Mr. Stevens to be particularly applied to the stroke made by the wild boar with his tusks.]

He I mind'd my purpose in his arm, rash'd his double-breast, ran him close by the left cheek, and through his hair. J. Tasso.

Rasher (rash'er), n. [Either a piece hastily cooked, from rash, a.; or rather a piece sliced off, from above verb.] In cookery, a slice of bacon for frying or broiling.

2. To approve and sanction; to make valid; especially, to sanction and render valid, as something done by a representative, agent, or servant; as, to ratify an agreement or treaty.

The Lateran Council ratified this momentous treaty, which became thereby the law of Christendom. Milman.

Ratification (rat'i-fa-bi'shon), n. [L. ratificatio, ratificatio—ratius, fixed by calculation, and habeo, habitu, to have, to hold.] Confirmation; approval; consent.

In matters criminal ratification, or approving of the act, does always make the approver guilty. J. Taylor.

Rating (rā'ting), n. [From rate, to estimate.] The act of estimating or fixing the rank of; hence, rank. The rating of men in the navy signifies the grade in which they are rated or entered in the ship's books. The rating of ships is the division into grades by which the complement of officers and certain allowances are determined.

Ratio (rā'shi-ō), n. [L. ratio, rationis, a reckoning, calculation, from reor, ratius, to think or suppose, to set, confirm, or establish. Reason, ration are the same word under different forms. See REASON.] 1. Lit. reason; cause.—2. Relation or proportion which one thing has to another in respect of magnitude or quantity; or, in a narrower sense, the numerical measure which one quantity bears to another of the same kind, expressed by the number found by dividing the one by the other. The ratio of one quantity to another is by some mathematicians regarded as the quotient obtained by dividing the second quantity by the first; by others, as the quotient obtained by dividing the first by the second; thus the ratio of 2 to 4 or 4 to 2 may be called either $\frac{2}{4}$ or $\frac{4}{2}$ or $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{2}{1}$.

Proportion, in the mathematical sense, has to do with the comparison of ratios. Thus 3 has to 4 a certain ratio, and so has 6 to 8; and the expression 3 is to 4 in the same proportion as 6 to 8, denotes that the ratios of 3 to 4 and 6 to 8 are equal, 3 being the same proportion of 4 as 6 is of 8, that is, three-fourths. Ratio in the above sense is sometimes called geometrical ratio, in opposition to arithmetical ratio or the difference between two quantities.—Compound ratio. When one quantity is connected with two others in such a manner that if the first be increased or diminished the product of the other two is increased or diminished in the same proportion, then the first quantity is said to be in the compound ratio of the other two. Thus the momentum of a moving body is in the compound ratio of the quantity of matter and the velocity.—Direct ratio. When two quantities or magnitudes have a certain ratio to each other, and are at the same time subject to increase or diminution, if while one increases the other increases in the same ratio, or if while one diminishes the other diminishes in the same ratio, the proportions or comparisons of ratios remain unaltered, and those quantities or magnitudes are said to be in a direct ratio or proportion to each other. Thus in uniform motion the space is in the direct ratio of the time.—Inverse ratio. When two quantities or magnitudes are such that when one increases the other necessarily diminishes, and vice versa when the one diminishes the other increases, the ratio or proportion is said to be inverse. Thus in uniform motion the time is in the inverse ratio of the velocity.—Duplicate ratio. When three quantities are in continued proportion the first is said to have to the third the duplicate ratio of that which it has to the second, or the first is to the third as the square of the first to the square of the second. Also, when any number of quantities are in continued proportion the ratio of the first to the last is said to be compounded of the several intermediate ratios.—Mixed ratio. See under MIXED.—Prime and ultimate ratios, terms first introduced, at least in a system, by Newton, who preferred them to the terms suggested by his own method of fluxions. The method of prime and ultimate ratios is a method of calculation which may be considered as an extension of the ancient method of exhaustions. It may be thus explained:—Let there be two variable quantities constantly approaching each other in value, so that their ratio or quotient continually approaches to unity, and at last differs from unity by less than any assignable quantity, the ultimate ratio of these two quantities is said to be a ratio of equality. In general, when different variable quantities respectively and simultaneously approach other quantities, considered as invariable, so that the differences between the variable and invariable quantities become at the same time less than any assignable quantity, the ultimate ratios of the variables are the ratios of the invariable quantities or limits to which they continually and simultaneously approach. They are called prime ratios or ultimate ratios according as the ratios of the variables are considered as receding from or approaching to the ratios of the limits. The first section of Newton's Principia contains the development of prime and ultimate ratios, with various propositions.—Extreme and mean ratio. See under EXTREME.—Composition of ratios, the uniting of two or more simple ratios into one, by taking the product of the antecedents and the product of the consequents.—3. In law, an account; a cause, or the giving judgment therein.

Ratiocinate (rash-i-ōe'i-nāt), v. t. pret. & pp. ratiocinated; ppr. ratiocinating. [L. ratiocinor, ratiocinatus, from ratio, reason.] To reason; to argue.

Scholars, and such as love to ratiocinate, will have more and better matter to exercise their wits upon. Sir H. Pety.

Ratiocination (rash-i-ōe'i-nā'shon), n. [L. ratiocinatio, ratiocinatio. See RATIOCINATE.] The act or process of reasoning, especially of reasoning deductively; the act or process of deducing consequences from premises.

Can any kind of ratiocination allow Christ all the marks of the Messiah, and yet deny him to be the Messiah? South.

Reasoning, in the extended sense in which I use the term, and in which it is synonymous with inference, is popularly said to be of two kinds; reasoning from particulars to generals, and reasoning from generals to particulars; the former being called induction, the latter ratiocination or syllogism. Fr. S. Mill.

Ratiocinative (rash-i-ōe'i-nā-tiv), a. Characterized by or addicted to ratiocination; consisting in the comparison of propositions or facts, and the deduction of inferences from the comparison; argumentative; as, a ratiocinative process. 'The ratiocinative meditativeness of his character.' Coleridge. Ratiocinatory (rash-i-ōe'i-nā-tō-ri), a. Same as ratiocinative.

Ratio decidendi (rā'shi-ō des-i-den'di). [L.] In Scots law, the reason or ground upon which a judgment is rested.

Ratio (rā'shon), n. [Fr. from L. ratio, rationis, proportion. See RATIO.] 1. In the army and navy, the allowance of provisions given to each officer, non-commissioned officer, soldier, and sailor. Hence.—2. A stated or fixed amount or quantity dealt out; allowance.

Ratio (rā'shon), v. t. To supply with ratios. 'Regularly rationed.' Blackwood's Mag.

Rational (rash'on-al), a. [Fr. rationnel; L. rationalis, from ratio, rationis, proportion. See REASON.] 1. Having reason or the faculty of reasoning; endowed with reason; opposed to irrational; as, man is a rational being; brutes are not rational animals.

It is our glory and happiness to have a rational nature. Law.

2. Agreeable to reason; not absurd, extravagant, foolish, fanciful, preposterous, or the like; as, a rational conclusion or inference; rational conduct.—3. Acting in conformity to reason; wise; judicious; as, a rational man.—4. In arith. and alg. a term applied to an expression in finite terms; or, one on which no extraction of a root is left; or, at least, none such indicated which cannot be actually performed by known processes. The contraries of these are called surd or irrational quantities. Thus 2, 9, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ are rational quantities, and $\sqrt{2}$, $\sqrt[3]{4}$, &c., are irrational or surd quantities, because their values can only be approximately and not accurately assigned.—Rational horizon. See HORIZON.—Syn. Sane, sound, intelligent, reasonable, sensible, wise, discreet, judicious.

Rational (rash'on-al), n. A rational being. 'The world of rationals.' Young.

Rationale (rash-o-nā'lē), n. [A somewhat peculiar word, in form the neut. sing. of L. rationalis, and apparently from ratio, rationis, in sense of reason, account, plan.] 1. A statement of reasons; a series of reasons assigned; as, Dr. Sparrow's rationale of the Common Prayer.—2. An account or exposition of the principles of some opinion, action, hypothesis, phenomenon, &c.

Rationalism (rash'on-al-izm), n. 1. In metaph. the doctrine which affirms that reason furnishes certain elements without which experience is not possible, as opposed to sensualism or sensism, which affirms that all our knowledge is derived from sense, and to empiricism, which refers all our knowledge to sensation and reflection, or experience.—2. In theol. a system of opinions deduced from reason, as distinct from inspiration, or opposed to it; the interpretation of Scripture truths upon the principles of human reason, which has become notorious by the theological systems to which it has given birth in Germany. From the middle of the eighteenth century there has arisen in that country a succession of divines—Baumgarten, Michaelis, Semler, Eichhorn, Paulus, Bretschneider, Schleiermacher, &c., who have endeavoured either to affix Raveningly (rav'en-ingly), adv. In a ravening or ravenous manner; voraciously; greedily. J. Udall.

Ravennese (rav'en-ēz), a. and n. Belonging to Ravenna; an inhabitant or inhabitants of Ravenna.

Ravenous (rav'en-us), a. [From raven, prey, rāpne.] 1. Furiously voracious; hungry even to rage; devouring with rapacious eagerness; as, a ravenous wolf, lion, or vulture; to be ravenous with hunger. 'Ravenous birds.' Shak. xxix. 4. 'Starved and ravenous.' Shak.—2. Eager for gratification; as, ravenous appetite or desire.

If, in any part of any great example, there be anything unsound, these flesh-flies detect it with an unerring instinct, and dart upon it with a ravenous delight. Macaulay.

Ravenously (rav'en-us-ly), adv. In a ravenous manner; with raging voracity.

Ravenousness (rav'en-us-ness), n. The state or quality of being ravenous; extreme voracity; rage for prey; as, the ravenousness of one's hunger.

The ravenousness of a lion or bear are (is) natural to them. Sir M. Hale.

Raven's-duck (rā'vns-duk), n. [G. ravenstuck.] A species of sailcloth.

Ravenstone (rā'vn-stōn), n. [Translation of G. rabenstein.] Place of execution; gallows. [Rare.]

Do not think I shall honour you so much as to save your throat from the ravenstone by choking you myself. Byron.

Raver (rā'vēr), n. One that raves or is furious.

Ravin (rav'in), n. Prey; food got by violence. See RAVEN, prey.

Ravin (rav'in), a. Ravenous.

I met the ravin lion when he roar'd With sharp constraint of hunger. Shak.

Ravin (rav'in), v.t. To eat ravenously; to devour greedily. 'Rats that ravin down their proper bane.' Shak. Written also Rasen.

Thriftless ambition, that will ravin up Thine own life's means! Shak.

Ravin (rav'in), v.i. To show ravenousness. Written also Raven.

Ravinala, n. See RAVENALA.

Ravine (rav'in), n. [Fr.] Rapine; prey. Chaucer.

Thou Nature, red in tooth and claw With ravine, shriek'd against his creed. Tennyson.

Ravine (ra-vēn), n. [Fr. ravine, a ravine, a hollow worn by floods; from L. rapina, rapine, violence, from rapio, to seize or carry away.] 1. A great flood. 'A ravine, or inundation of waters, which overcometh all things that come in its way.' Cotgrave.—2. A long deep hollow worn by a stream or torrent of water; hence, any deep narrow gorge in a mountain, &c.; a gully.

Ravined (rav'ind), a. Ravenous. 'The ravined salt-sea shark.' Shak.

Raviney (ra-vē'nī), a. Full of ravines. Capt. M. Thomson. [Rare.]

Raving (rā'ving), p. and a. Furious with delirium; mad; distracted; used adverbially in the phrase raving mad.

Raving (rā'ving), n. Furious exclamation; irrational incoherent talk.

The very feeling which would have restrained us from committing the act would have led us, after it had been committed, to defend it against the ravings of servility and superstition. Macaulay.

Ravishly (rā'ving-ly), adv. In a raving manner; with furious wildness or frenzy; with distraction. Sir P. Sidney.

Ravisable, t. a. [Fr.] Ravenous. Chaucer.

Ravish (rav'ish), v.t. [Fr. ravis, ravisant, from L. rapio, rapere, to seize, to snatch. For -ish from French verbs in -ir, see -ISH. From same Latin stem come rapid, ravine, ravage. See RAPID.] 1. To seize and carry away by violence.

These hairs, which thou dost ravish from my chin, Will quicken and accuse thee. Shak.

This hand shall ravish thy pretended right. Dryden.

2. To have carnal knowledge of a woman by force and against her consent; to violate; to commit a rape upon.

Their houses shall be spoiled and their wives ravished. Is. xiii. 16.

3. To transport with joy or delight; to delight to ecstasy; to enrapture; to enchant.

Thou hast ravished my heart. Can. iv. 9.

With ravished ears, The monarch hears. Dryden.

SYN. To violate, deflower, congregate, force, transport, entrance, overjoy, enrapture, delight.

Ravisher (rav'ish-ēr), n. 1. One that takes by violence. Pope.—2. One that forces a woman to his carnal embrace.—3. One who or that which transports with delight.

Ravishing (rav'ish-ing), p. and a. 1. Snatching or taking by violence.—2. Compelling to submit to carnal intercourse.—3. Delighting to rapture; transporting.—4. Rapid. Chaucer.

Ravishing (rav'ish-ing), n. 1. The act of one who ravishes.—2. Ecstatic delight; transport. Feltham.

Ravishingly (rav'ish-ing-ly), adv. In a ravishing manner; to extremity of delight; as, ravishingly beautiful.

Ravishment (rav'ish-ment), n. 1. The act of carrying away; abduction; as, the ravishment of children from their parents, of a ward from his guardian, or of a wife from her husband.—2. The act of ravishing a woman; forcible violation of chastity. 'Ancient stories of the ravishment of chaste maidens.' Jer. Taylor.—3. Rapture; transport of delight; ecstasy.

All things joy with ravishment Attracted by thy beauty still to gaze. Milton.

Raw (rā), a. [A Sax. Arēdo, hrāw; cog. D. rauw, Dan. raa, Icel. Ardr, O.H.G. rāo, G. roh, raw. Same root as L. crudus, raw, having originally had an initial guttural.] 1. Not altered from its natural state by cooking; not roasted, boiled, or the like; not subdued by heat; as, raw meat.—2. Not distilled.

Distilled waters will last longer than raw waters. Bacon.

3. Not subjected to some industrial or manufacturing process; as, (a) not spun or twisted; not worked up; not manufactured; as, raw silk, raw cotton, raw material. (b) Not tried or melted and strained; as, raw tallow. (c) Not tanned; as, raw hides.—4. Not mixed or diluted; as, raw spirits. 'Swallowed some raw brandy.' Farrar.—5. Not covered with skin or other natural covering; having the flesh exposed. 'With skull all raw.' Spenser.

'Since yet thy cicatrice looks raw and red after the Danish sword.' Shak.—6. Sore, as if galled; sensitive.

And all his sinews waxen weak and raw Through long imprisonment. Spenser.

7. Immature; unripe; hence, unseasoned; untutored; inexperienced; unripe in skill; untried; as, raw soldiers or sailors. 'Raw tricks.' Shak. 'The raw judgment of the multitude.' De Quincey. 'One they knew—raw from the nursery.' Tennyson.

I tender you my service, Such as it is, being tender, raw and young. Shak.

8. Bleak; chilly; cold, or rather cold and damp; as, a raw day; a raw cold climate. A raw and gusty day. Shak.

Raw (rā), n. 1. A raw, galled, or sore place; an established sore, as on a horse; as, he struck him on the raw.—2. A tender point; a folia. [Colloq.]

It's a tender subject and every one has a raw on it. Lever.

—To touch a person upon the raw, to irritate a person by alluding to, or joking him on, any matter about which he is especially sensitive.

Rawbone (rā'bōn), a. Raw-boned. 'His rawbone cheeks.' Spenser.

Raw-boned (rā'bōnd), a. Having little flesh on the bones; gaunt; lean and large-boned. 'Raw-boned rascals.' Shak.

Rawhead (rā'hēd), n. A spectre, mentioned to frighten children.

Servants awe children, and keep them in subjection, by telling them of rawhead and bloody bones. Locke.

Rawhide (rā'hīd), n. A cowhide, or coarse riding-whip, made of untanned leather, twisted.

Rawish (rā'ish), a. Somewhat raw; cool and damp. Marston. [Rare.]

Rawly (rā'ly), adv. 1. In a raw manner; especially, in an ignorant or inexperienced manner; without experience.—2. Hastily; without preparation and provision.

Some crying for a surgeon; some upon their wives left poor behind them; some upon the debts they owe; some upon their children rawly left. Shak.

Rawness (rā'nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being raw: (a) want of cooking; as, the rawness of meat. (b) State of being inexperienced; as, the rawness of seamen or troops. (c) State of being uncovered with skin; as, the rawness of a wound. (d) Chilliness with dampness; bleakness.—2. Hasty manner; lack of preparation.

Why in that rawness left you wife and child, Those precious motives, those strong knots of love, Without leave taking. Shak.

Raw-port (rā'pōrt), n. A port-hole in small vessels for working an oar in a calm.

Rax (raks), v.i. [A form allied to reach. See REACH.] To extend the bodily members, as one when fatigued or awaking; to stretch, to admit of extension; to make efforts to attain. Ramsey. [Scotch.]

Rax (raks), v.t. To stretch; to extend; to reach; as, to rax a person something from a shelf. Burns. [Scotch.]

Ray (rā), n. [O.Fr. ray, a sunbeam, from L. radius, a ray (whence radiant).] 1. A line of light, or the straight line supposed to be described by a particle of light. A collection of parallel rays constitutes a beam; a collection of diverging or converging rays, a pencil. The mixed solar beam contains, 1st, Herschelian, calorific rays, producing heat and expansion, but not vision and colour; 2d, colorific rays, producing vision and colour, but not heat or expansion; 3d, chemical or actinic rays, producing certain effects on the composition of bodies, but neither heat, expansion, vision, nor colour.

2. A beam of intellectual light; perception; apprehension; sight. Pope.—3. One of a number of lines or radii diverging from a centre.

The significance of the term (ray) has lately been extended. In its most general sense, any group of straight lines drawn from a fixed centre, whether they are contained within the same plane or otherwise in this very general meaning, it is now frequently employed in geometry. Prof. Nichol.

4. In bot. the radiating part of a flower or plant; as, (a) the outer part or circumference of a compound radiate flower. (b) A plate of compressed parallelograms of cellular tissue, connecting the texture of the stem, and maintaining a communication between the centre and the circumference.—5. In ich. one of the radiating bony spines in the fins of fishes, serving to support the membrane.—6. A kind of striped cloth 'The riche rayes.' Piers Plowman.—Principal ray. See PRINCIPAL.—Visual ray. See VISUAL.

Ray (rā), n. [Fr. raie, from L. radius, a ray.] Rala, a genus of elasmobranchiate fishes, recognized by the flattened body, which resembles a broad disk from its union with the extremely broad and fleshy pectorals, which are joined to each other before or to the snout and which extend behind the two sides of the abdomen as far as the base of the ventrals, resembling the rays of a fan. In the various subdivisions of this genus we find the sting-ray, spotted torpedo, thornback, akate, &c.

Ray (rā), v.t. 1. To streak; to mark with long lines; to form rays.

Unloved, the sun-flower, shining fair, (Shall) ray round with flames her disk of seed. Tennyson.

2. To shoot forth or emit; to cause to shine out.

Shines o'er the rest, the pastoral queen, and rays Her smiles, sweet-beaming, on her shepherd king. Thomson.

Ray (rā), v.i. To shine forth or out, as in rays.

In a molten glory shined That rays off into gloom. E. B. Browning.

Ray (rā), v.t. To discolour; to defile or disfigure; to foul; to soil. Shak.

Ray (rā), n. Array; order; arrangement; dress. 'And spoiling all her goodly ray.' Spenser.

Ray (rā), v.t. To array.

Ray (rā), n. A disease of sheep. Called also Scab, Shab, or Rubbers.

Rayah (rā'yā), n. [Ar. ra'yah, a flock or herd, a tenant, a peasant, from ra'a, to pasture.] In Turkey, a person not a Mohammedan who pays the capitation tax.

Rayed (rad), a. Having rays; adorned with rays; radiated.

The third is an octagonal chapel, of which we can see but little more than the roof with its rayed tiles. Ruskin.

—Rayed or radiated animals, Radiata (which see).

Starry Ray (Raja radiata).

Ray-grass (rá'gras), n. Same as Rye-grass (which see).

Rayle (rá'lé), v. i. To snarl; to howl. Sponser.

See RAIL.

Rayless (rá'les), a. Destitute of light; dark; not illuminated. 'Rayless majesty.' Young.

Rayne (rá'né), n. Empire; realm; region; reign. Sponser.

Rayon (rá'on), n. [Fr. rayon.] A beam or ray. Sponser.

Rayonnant, Rayonned, Rayones (rá'on-nant, rá'on-né, rá'on-é), a. In her. the same as Radient (which see).

Race (rás), n. A root. See RACE, a root; RACE GINGER. (In the following passage this word seems to signify a package or bale, it may be loosely used for a package of race-gering.)

I have a package of bacon and two races of ginger to be delivered as far as Charing Cross. Shak.

Race (rás), v. t. pret. & pp. raced; pp. racing. [Fr. raiser, from L. raide, rauerum, to scrape, whence also razer. See RACE.] 1. To strike on the surface; to glance along the surface of; to trace; to race.

He dreamt to-night the bear had raced his helm. Shak.

To pass there was such scanty room, The bare descending raced his plume. St. M. Scott.

2. To subvert from the foundation; to overthrow; to demolish; as, to race a city to the ground. 'The royal hand that raced unhappy Troy.' Dryden.—3. To cease; to efface, to obliterate. 'Racing the characters of your renown.' Shak.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased, Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow, Raze out the written troubles of the brain? Shak.

4. To extirpate; to destroy; to make away with.

I'll find a day to measure them all, And race their faction and their family. Shak.

Raced (rás), p. and a. In her. same as Erased (which see).

Raise (rá'sé), n. [Fr. raiser, from raiser, to raise, to cut down ships. See RACE.] A ship of war cut down to a smaller size, as a seventy-four to a frigate, &c.

Raise (rá'sé), v. t. To cut down or reduce to a lower class, as a ship; hence, to lessen or abridge by cutting out parts; as, to raise a book or an article.

Raiser (rá'sér), n. [Fr. raiser, from raiser, from L. raide, rauerum, to scrape. See RACE, RAISE.] 1. A keen-edged knife used for shaving.—2. A tank; as, the raiser of a boat. Johnson.

Rasurable (rá'sor-é-bil), a. Fit to be shaved.

Th' new-born child Be rough and rasurable. Shak.

Razor-back, Razor-backed Whale (rá'-sur-bak, rá'sor-bak-t-whál), n. One of the largest species of the whale tribe, the Balaenoptera or Roquefortia borealis, the great northern rorqual. See ROQUEFORT.

Razor-bill (rá'sor-bíl), n. An aquatic bird, the Alca torda or common auk. See AUK.

Razor-fish (rá'sor-fáh), n. 1. A species of fish with a compressed body, much prized for the table. It is the Coryphæna nasuta. 2. The Rasbora (which see).

Rasul-shall (rá'sul-shál), n. The vernacular name for the shell of some species of the genus Solen. See SOLEN.

Razor-stone (rá'sor-stón), n. See NOVA-LITE.

Razor-strop (rá'sor-strop), n. A strop for sharpening razors. Written also Rasor-strop.

Rasure (rá'shür), n. [Fr. rasure; L. rasura, from radere, to scrape. See RACE.] 1. The act of erasing or effacing; obliteration. 'The tooth of time, and rasures of oblivion.' Shak. See RASER.—2. That which is rased; an erasure.

There were many rasures in the book of the treasury. Shak.

Ravage (rá'váj), n. [Ar. raparja.] An incursion made by military into an enemy's country for the purpose of carrying off cattle and destroying the standing crops. It always conveys the idea of pillage. Its meaning is sometimes extended to other sorts of incursions.

Re-, A prefix from the Latin, denoting iteration, return, repetition, retrogression, &c. The form re- also occurs in words beginning with a vowel, as in redolent, redeem. In some words it has lost its special signification, as in rejoice, recommend, receive.

Re (rá), n. In music, the name given by the Italians and French to the second note of the diatonic scale, and generally throughout Europe to the second of the syllables used in solfège.

Re (rá), n. In Egypt. myth. same as Rhe. Re-absorb (ré-ab-sorb), v. t. 1. To absorb or imbibe again. Kiwan.—2. To swallow up again.

The Thing, in philosophical uncommercial language, is still a so-thing, steadily subsistence, and depiction of the slight—designs oblivion incessantly giving it its impetus till chance to which it belongs re-absorbs it. Carlyle.

Re-absorption (ré-ab-sorp-shon), n. The act of re-absorbing, or the state of being re-absorbed.

Re-access (ré-ak-'ses), n. A new or fresh access or approach; a visit renewed. 'The re-access of the sun.' Hawthorne.

Re-accuse (ré-ak-'küz'), v. t. To accuse again or afresh. 'Who re-accused Norfolk for words of treason he had used.' Daniel.

Reach (réch), v. t. Reicht, the ancient pret., is obsolete. The verb is now regular; pret. & pp. reached; pp. reaching. [A. Sax. reacen (as long), O. Fr. reice, G. reichen, to reach, to extend, to hold out. From same root as rich, right, and L. rege, to govern, rex, a king, K. regal.] 1. To extend; to stretch; to hold or put forth; to spread abroad; often followed by out and forth.

Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach thither thy hand and thrust it into my side. St. M. Scott.

Prick't out over-woolly reach'd too far Their pamper'd boughts. Milton.

But who shall so forecast the years And find in loss a gain to match? Or reach a hand thro' time to catch The far-off interest of heart? Tennyson.

2. To attain or obtain by stretching forth the hand; to extend to; to touch by extending, either the arm alone or with an instrument in the hand; to strike from a distance; as, to reach a book on the shelf; I cannot reach the object with my cane.

O patron power, thy present aid afford, That I may reach the board. Dryden.

3. To extend to; to stretch out as far, or as high as; to touch in extent.

Will thou reach stars because they shine on thee? Shak.

When he addresses himself to battle against the guardian angels, he sends the Tempter or Atlas; his stature reaches the sky. Carlyle.

4. To deliver with the hand by extending the arm; to give with the hand.

Reach a chair; So; now, methinks, I feel a little ease. Shak.

Having opened his father's casque, he was rejoiced to see him give symptoms of reanimation. Sir W. Scott.

Reannex (ré-an-neks), v.t. To annex again; to reunite; to annex what has been separated.

King Charles was not a little inflamed with an ambition to repurchase and reannex that duchy. Bacon.

Reannexation (ré-an-nek-sá'shon), n. The act of annexing again.

Reanoint (ré-a-noint'), v.t. To anoint again or anew.

And Edward . . . Proud in his spoils, to London doth repair, And reanointed, mounts th' imperial chair. Dryden.

Reanswer (ré-an'sér), v.t. To answer again; to correspond to; to be equivalent to; to repay; to compensate. Shak.

Reap (rép), v.t. [A. Sax. ripan, to reap; closely allied to Goth. raupjan, to pluck, as also to D. raspen, to glean, to gather; L.G. repen, to pluck. Ripe is no doubt from the same stem.] 1. To cut with a sickle, scythe, or reaping-machine, as a grain crop; to cut down and gather; to gather when ripe or ready; as, to reap wheat or rye.

When you reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field. Lev. xix. 9.

2. To cut down the crop on; to clear of a crop, especially of a grain crop; as, to reap a field; hence, to shave. 'His chin new reaped.' Shak.—3. To obtain; to receive as a reward, or as the fruit of labour or of works; in a good or bad sense; as, to reap a benefit from exertions. 'Shalt reap the gain.' Shak.

He that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. Gal. vi. 8.

Reap (rép), v.t. 1. To perform the act or operation of reaping.

Only reapers, reaping early In among the bearded barley Hear a song that echoes cheerly. Tennyson.

2. To receive the fruit of labour or works.

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Ps. cxxvi. 5.

Reaper (rép'er), n. 1. One who reaps; one who cuts grain with a sickle, scythe, or other implement or machine; hence, one who gathers in the fruits of his labours or works.

In the vast field of criticism on which we are entering, innumerable reapers have already put their sickles. Macaulay.

2. A machine for cutting grain; a reaping-machine.

Reaping-hook (rép'ing-hök), n. An instrument used in reaping; a sickle (which see).

The reapers in Palestine and Syria still make use of the reaping-hook in cutting down their crops; and 'fill their hand' with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves, their 'bosom.' Ps. cxxix. 7; Ruth ii. 5. Dr. Kitts.

Reaping-machine (rép'ing-ma-shén), n. A machine for cutting down standing corn, &c. The usual construction now consists of a drawing-wheel fixed to one side of the frame, to which is attached a spur-wheel gearing into a series of small toothed wheels which increase the slow speed of the periphery of the main wheel to the fast motion necessary for driving the cutting knives. These knives generally consist of triangular pieces of steel riveted to an iron bar, and are sometimes smooth and sometimes tooth-edged. The knife-bar is attached to a crank by a connecting-rod, and this crank, which makes about 700 revolutions per minute, receives its accelerated motion through a train of wheels in direct communication with the large driving-wheel, which moves as the machine is drawn over the field by horse-power. The knife-bar moves backwards and forwards on guides fixed at the back of a number of pointed fingers, which enter the standing grain and guide the straw to the edges of the knives. A platform is fixed behind the cutter bar, which receives the corn as it falls from the knives. In most cases a revolving rake with four inclined arms is attached to such machines, and set in motion by the driving-wheel. Two of the arms bring the corn well on to the knife, and the others deliver the corn cut at the back of the machine. Many of the recent machines are also fitted with a binding apparatus. An endless apron receives the grain as it is cut, and deposits it in a trough on the outer side of the machine. By an ingenious mechanical arrangement the loose straw is caught and compressed by two iron arms; wire from a reel is passed round the sheaf, fastened by twisting, cut away, and the bound sheaf is tossed out of the trough by one of the arms by which it was compressed. Other apparatus are constructed so as to bind with cord, straw rope, &c.

Reapparel (ré-ap-par'el), v.t. To clothe again.

Then (at the resurrection) we shall all be invested, reapparelled, in our own bodies. Donne.

Reappear (ré-ap-pér), v.i. To appear again or anew.

To mute and to material things New life revolving summer brings; The genial call dead nature hears, And in her glory reappears. Sir W. Scott.

Reappearance (ré-ap-pér'ans), n. A second or new appearance.

Reapplication (ré-ap-p'li-ká'shon), n. The act of applying again; the state of being re-applied. Norris.

Reapply (ré-ap-p'li), v.t. or i. To apply again.

Reappoint (ré-ap-point'), v.t. To appoint again.

Reappointment (ré-ap-point'ment), n. A renewed or second appointment.

Reapportion (ré-ap-pór'shon), v.t. To apportion again. Wright.

Reapportionment (ré-ap-pór'shon-ment), n. A renewed or second apportionment.

Reapproach (ré-ap-próch), v.t. or i. To approach again or anew.

Rear (rér), n. [O. Fr. riere, Pr. reire, from L. retro, behind—re, back, and suffix tro, direction or motion, from root corresponding to Skt. tár, to move. (b) In colleges and schools, the rehearsal of a lesson by pupils before their instructor.—2. The composition or matter delivered or recited.

Recitative (rē-si-tā-tiv'), a. [Fr. recitativ; It. recitativo. See RECITE.] 1. Reciting; rehearsing.—2. Pertaining to, or intended for, musical recitation or declamation; in the style or manner of recitative. 'Recitative music.' Dryden.

Recitative (rē-si-tā-tiv'), n. A species of vocal composition which differs from an air in having no definite rhythmical arrangement, and no decided or strictly constructed melody, but approaches in tonal succession and rhythm to the declamatory accents of language. It is not governed by any principal or predominant key, though its close must be in some key of the air which follows, or, at least, in no very remote key. It is used in operas, oratorios, &c., to express some action or passion, or to relate a story or reveal a secret or design. There are two kinds of recitative, unaccompanied and accompanied. The first is when a few occasional chords are struck by an instrument or instruments to give the singer the pitch, and intimate to him the harmony. The second, which is now the more common, is when all, or a considerable portion, of the instruments of the orchestra accompany the singer, either in sustained chords or florid passages, in order to give the true expression or colouring to the passion or sentiment to be expressed.—2. A piece of music to be sung recitatively.

Recitatively (rē-si-tā-tiv'li), adv. In the manner of recitative.

Recitativo (rē-si-tā-tiv'vō), n. [It.] Recitative (which see). 'Then thus in quaint recitativo spoke.' Pope.

In racing, the time in which a race or heat is won.—In record, upon record, set down; registered. 'The faults whose fine stands in record.' Shak. 'My villainy they have upon record.' Shak. [Old authors accent this noun as the verb, and this accentuation is sometimes still retained, as in the phrase, a court of record.]

Recordance (rê-kord'ans), n. Remembrance; recollection. Howell.

Recordari facias loquela (rek-or-dâ'ri fâ'hî-as lok-wê'lam). [L., that you cause the plaintiff to be recorded.] In law, an old writ directed to the sheriff to make a record of the proceedings of a cause depending in an inferior court, and remove the same to the King's (Queen's) Bench or Common Pleas.

Recordation (rek-or-dâ'shon), n. [L. recordatio, recordationis, from recorder. See RECORD.] 1. Remembrance. Shak. 'A due recordation of his virtues.' Wotton.—2. Record; register.

Recorder (rê-kord'ér), n. 1. One who records; specifically, a person whose official duty is to register writings or transactions. 2. In England, the chief judicial officer of a borough or city, exercising within it, in criminal matters, the jurisdiction of a court of record, whence his title is derived. The appointment of recorders is vested in the crown, and the selection is confined to barristers of five years' standing. The recorder of London is appointed by the lord-mayor and aldermen. He is judge of the lord-mayor's court, and one of the commissioners of the central criminal court. The same name is given to similar legal functionaries elsewhere, as in certain colonial settlements. 3. The name of a musical instrument formerly in use in this country, somewhat like a flageolet.

The variations of languages are reduced to rules.
Johnson.

9. To bring from a form less fit to one more fit for operation; specifically, (a) in arith. to change numbers from one denomination into another without altering their value, or from one denomination into others of the same value; as, to reduce a shilling to forty-eight farthings, or forty-eight farthings to a shilling. (b) In alg. to bring to the simplest form with the unknown quantity of an equation by itself on one side, and all the known quantities on the other side. (c) In logic, to bring a syllogism in an imperfect mood into some one of the four perfect moods in the first figure. — 10. In metal. to separate, as a pure metal from a metallic ore. — 11. In surg. to restore to its proper place or state, as a dislocated or fractured bone. — 12. In Scots law, to set aside by an action at law; to rescind or annul by legal means; as, to reduce a deed, writing, &c. — To reduce a figure, design, or draught, to make a copy of it smaller than the original, but preserving the form and proportion. — To reduce to the ranks (milit.), to degrade for misconduct to the position of a private soldier. — SYN. To diminish, lessen, decrease, abate, shorten, curtail, impair, lower, subject, subdue, subjugate, conquer.

Reducement (ré-dû's'ment), n. The act of reducing; reduction. Milton [Rare.]

Reducible (ré-dû's'i-bl), a. [L. reducens, reducens, ppr. of reduco, to reduce. See REDUCE] tending to reduce.

Reducent (ré-dû's'ent), n. That which reduces.

Reducer (ré-dû's'er), n. One that reduces. Reducible (ré-dû's'i-bl), a. Capable of being reduced; convertible.

All the parts of painting are reducible into these mentioned by the author.
Dryden.

Reducibleness (ré-dû's'i-bl-ness), n. The quality of being reducible. Boyle.

Reducibly (ré-dû's'i-bl-ly), adv. In a reducible manner.

Reduct (ré-dûkt'), v. t. [L. reduco, reducitum. See REDUCE] To reduce; to bring together. Hall.

Reduct (ré-dûkt'), n. In building, a little place taken out of a larger to make it more regular and uniform, or for some other convenience; a quirk. Gwilt.

Reducibility (ré-dûkt-i-bl'i-ti), n. The quality of being reducible; reducibleness.

Reductio ad absurdum (ré-dûkt'ah-d ad ab-sér'dum), [L.] A reduction to an absurdity, a species of argument which proves not the thing asserted, but the absurdity of everything which contradicts it. It is much used in geometry. In this way the proposition is not proved in a direct manner by principles before laid down, but it is shown that the contrary is absurd or impossible; and thus the truth of the proposition is demonstrated indirectly. This method of demonstration is frequently termed indirect, in contradistinction to the ordinary or direct method.

Reduction (ré-dûk'shon), n. [Fr. réduction; L. reductio, reductio. See REDUCE] The act of reducing, or state of being reduced: (a) conversion into another state or form; as, the reduction of a body to powder; the reduction of things to order. (b) Diminution; as, the reduction of the expenses of government; the reduction of the national debt. (c) Conquest; subjugation; as, the reduction of a province under the power of a foreign nation. (d) In arith. (1) the bringing of numbers of one denomination into another; as, the reduction of pounds, ounces, pennyweights, and grains to grains, or the reduction of grains to pounds; the reduction of days and hours to minutes, or of minutes to hours and days. The change of numbers of a higher denomination into a lower, as of pounds into pence or farthings, is called reduction descending; the change of numbers of a lower denomination into a higher, as of farthings and pence into pounds, is called reduction ascending. Hence the arithmetical rule for bringing sums of different denominations into one denomination is called reduc- tion. (2) The act or process of changing the form of a quantity or expression without changing its value; as, the reduction of fractions to lower or the lowest terms, to a common denominator, or the like. (e) In alg. the process of clearing equations of all superfluous quantities, bringing them to their lowest terms, and separating the known from the unknown, till the unknown quantity alone is found on one side, and the known ones on the other. (f) In geom. the process of constructing a figure similar to a given figure, either greater or less, or of constructing a figure equivalent to a given figure in area, but having a different number of sides; as, the reduction of a polygon to an equivalent triangle. (g) In logic, the process of bringing a syllogism in one of the so-called imperfect moods to a mood in the first figure. (h) The act or process of making a copy of a figure, map, design, draught, &c., on a smaller scale, preserving the proper proportions; also, the thing so reduced. (i) In surg. the operation of restoring a dislocated or fractured bone to its former place. (j) In metal. the operation of obtaining pure metals from metallic ores. (k) In astron. (1) the correction of observations for known errors of instruments, &c. (2) The collection of observations to obtain a general result. (l) In Scots law, an action for setting aside a deed, writing, &c. — Reduction and reduction-improbatum, the action of simple reduction and the action of reduction-improbatum are the two varieties of the rescissory actions of the law of Scotland. The object of this class of actions is to reduce and set aside deeds, services, decrees, and rights, whether heritable or movable, against which the pursuer of the action can allege and instruct sufficient legal grounds of reduction. See IMPROBATION. — Reduction reductive, an action in which a decree of reduction, which has been erroneously or improperly obtained, is sought to be reduced. — SYN. Diminution, lessening, decrease, abatement, curtailment, subjugation, conquest, subjection.

Reductive (ré-dûkt'iv), a. [Fr. réductif] Having the power of reducing; tending to reduce.

Inquire into the repentance of thy former life particularly; whether it were productive of fixed resolutions of holy living, and reductive of these to act.
Fer. Taylor.

Reductive (ré-dûkt'iv), n. That which has the power of reducing.

So that it should seem there needed no other reductive of the numbers of men to an equality, than the wars that have happened in the world.
Sir M. Hale.

Reductively (ré-dûkt'iv-ly), adv. By reduction; by consequence. Hammond.

Reduit (red-wé), n. [Fr.] A redoubt.

Redundance, Redundancy (ré-dun'dans, ré-dun'dan-si), n. [L. redundantia, from redundo. See REDOUND] 1. The quality of being redundant; superfluity; superabundance.

This has swollen our code to an enormous redundance till, in the labyrinth of written law, we almost feel again the uncertainty of arbitrary power.
Hallam.

2. That which is redundant or in excess; anything superfluous.

Labour ferments the humours, casts them into their proper channels, and throws off redundancies.
Addison.

3. In law, impertinent or foreign matter inserted in a pleading.

Redundant (ré-dun'dant), a. [L. redundans, redundantis, ppr. of redundo. See REDOUND] 1. Superfluous; exceeding what is natural or necessary; superabundant; exuberant; as, a redundant quantity of bile or food.

Notwithstanding the redundant oil in fishes, they do not increase fat so much as flesh.
Arbuthnot.

2. Using more words or images than are necessary or useful.

Where an author is redundant, mark those paragraphs to be retrenched.
Watts.

— Redundant hyperbola, in math. a line of the third order, having three pairs of asymptotic branches. — SYN. Superfluous, superabundant, excessive, exuberant, overflowing, plentiful, copious.

Redundantly (ré-dun'dant-ly), adv. In a redundant manner; with superfluity or excess; superfluously; superabundantly.

Reduplicate (ré-dû'pli-kát), v. t. [L. reduplico, reduplicatum — re and duplico. See DUPLICATE] 1. To double again; to multiply; to repeat. 'That reduplicated advice of our Saviour.' By Pearson. — 2. In philol. to repeat, as the initial syllable or the root of a word, as for the purpose of marking past time. See REDUPLICATION.

Reduplicate (ré-dû'pli-kát), v. i. In philol. to be doubled or repeated; to undergo reduplication.

Reduplicate (ré-dû'pli-kát), a. 1. Redoubled; repeated; reduplicative. — 2. In bot. applied to a form of aestivation in the edges of the sepals or petals which are turned outwards.

Reduplication (ré-dû'pli-ká'shon), n.

1. The act of doubling. — 2. In rhet. a figure in which a verse ends with the same word with which the following begins. — 3. In philol. (a) the repetition of the root of a word, or of the initial syllable (more or less modified), as for the purpose of marking past time, as in Greek pephugô, to flee, perfect pepheuga; so did is a reduplicated past.

All strong verbs in the Aryan languages originally formed their perfect tense by reduplication, that is by the repetition of the root. . . . In the Latin, Gothic, and Old English forms, the vowel change shows that the initial letter of the root has gone, and the first consonant is the initial of the reduplicated syllable. . . . In languages belonging to the Teutonic group, we have even clearer examples of reduplication, as well as of the loss of it.
Dr. Morris.

(b) The new syllable formed by reduplication.

Reduplicative (ré-dû'pli-kát-iv), a. Double; reduplicate. Watts.

Red-ware (red'wâr), n. A sea-weed, Laminaria digitata.

Red-wat (red'wat), a. Wetted by something red, as blood. [Scotch.]

The hand of her kindred has been red-wat in the heart's blude o' my name; but my heart says, Let bygones be bygones.
Blackwood's Mag.

Red-water (red'wâ-tér), n. A disease of cattle, and occasionally of sheep, in which the appetite and rumination become irregular, the bowels speedily become constipated, and the urine reddened with broken-down red globules of blood. It is caused by eating coarse, indigestible, innutritive food, by continued exposure to inclement weather, and other causes which lead to a deteriorated state of the blood. Called also Bloody Urine, Hæmaturia, and Moor-ill.

Redwing (red'wing), n. A species of thrush (Turdus iliacus), well-known in Britain as a winter bird of passage. It spends the summer in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, its winter range extending to the Mediterranean. It is about equal to the song thrush in size, congregates in large flocks, and has an exquisite song.

Red-wood (red'wud), n. The name of various sorts of wood of a red colour, as (a) an Indian dye-wood, the produce of Pterocarpus santalinus; (b) the wood of Cornus mascula, the red-wood of the Turks; (c) that of Gordonia Hematoxylon, the red-wood of Jamaica; (d) that of Pterocarpus dalbergioides, or Andaman wood; (e) that of Ceanothus cufubrinus, the red-wood of the Bahamas; (f) that of Sequoia sempervirens, a coniferous tree of California, the red-wood of the timber-trade. This last tree attains gigantic dimensions, being frequently more than 300 feet high. It has long been an inmate of our gardens. The name of red-wood trees is further given to the Soymdia febrifuga. See SOYMDIA.

Reed (réd), n. (O. E. rede, read. A. Sax. Aréde; O. E. reid, D. riet, ried, O. H. G. Aríet, Mod. G. riet, ried; also Ir. readan, Gael. ribhid—reed.) 1. A name usually applied indiscriminately to all tall, broad-leaved grasses which grow along the banks of streams, and even to other plants with similar leaves, growing in such situations, as the bamboo. Strictly speaking, however, it is the name given to plants of the genera Arundo, Phragmites, and especially to Phragmites communis (the common reed). This is the largest of all the grasses of northern climates, and one of the most universally diffused. It is used for various economical purposes, as for thatching, for protecting embankments, for roofing for cottages, &c. The sea-reed or nat-grass (Amphiphaea (or Paspalum) arenaria) is an important agent in binding together loose sandy sea-shores, and is manufactured into door-mats and floor-brushes. The bur-reed is of the genus Sparganium; the Indian flowering reed of the genus Canna. 2. An instrument made from a reed, with holes to be stopped by the fingers, a rustic or pastoral pipe. 'Arcadian pipes, the pastoral reed of Hermes.' Milton. (Used by Shakespeare, in this sense, adjectivally. And speak between the change of man and boy with a reed voice.' Shak.) 3. Part of a musical instrument: (a) a little tube through which a hautboy, bassoon, or clarinet is blown. (b) One of the thin plates of metal whose vibrations produce the notes of an accordion, harmonium, or seraphine, in which case it is called a reed; attached, also, to certain sets of registers of pipes in an organ, when it is called a beating or striking reed.—4. An arrow, as made of a reed.
